Among the obligations imposed upon railway corporations is that of using reasonable diligence in furnishing its road with safe equipments, including locomotives, engines, and of operating its road without negligence. That is a duty which it owes to the public, and any agreement which seeks to lessen the diligence and care with which it furnishes and operates its road is to that extent against public policy. The contract entered into between Griswold and defendant was not for carriage, and primarily it was for the benefit of the parties to it, and not in the interest of the public. But it is clear that its purpose on the part of defendant was to promote its business as a carrier. The nominal sum of one dollar was not the consideration which induced it to enter into the agreement. Elevators, coal sheds, and lumber yards are important aids to a railway engaged in carrying grain, coal, and lumber, in securing and transacting that branch of its business; and the promise of Griswold to maintain and use them, and to ship all grain, coal, and lumber he could control over defendant's road, and the prospect for business which the existence and use of the improvements named held out to defendant, were no doubt the controlling considerations which induced it to execute the lease. Those improvements were not only of value to defendant, but they were important to all who bought or sold commodities which were received in them. In other words, the lease was a means to promote the end for which the road of defendant was built and operated, and the public was interested in the improvements for which it provided to the extent to which it patronized them. Its interest may not have been a distinct entity, capable of enforcement at the suit of any citizen, but it was one which the law recognizes, and which it will, in a suitable case, protect. The lease itself fully recognizes an interest of the public in its subject matter. It provides that the lessee "shall transact the business for which said buildings are erected and designed at fair and reasonable rates, and in a prompt and careful manner, so that neither the company nor the public will be prejudiced by reason of the said lessee dealing unfairly or negligently in their behalf, or in the transaction of the business connected with the grain, coal, and lumber building so erected as aforesaid."

It is true that a contract is not void as against public policy unless it is injurious to the interests of the public, or contravenes some established interest of society. But when a contract belongs to that class it will be declared void, although in that particular instance no injury to the public may result. 5 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 2392. "A contract invading any one of the other interests which the law cherishes, though to do what is neither indictable nor prohibitory by a statute, termed a contract against public policy (or sound policy), is likewise void." Bishop, Cont. § 473.

We do not find it necessary to go to the extent of holding, as do some of the authorities cited, that the rule which invalidates a stipulation for exemption from liability for one's own negligence is of universal application, in order to support the conclusion which we reach that the provision under consideration is void. To require us to reach that conclusion, it is only necessary for it to appear that the provision, if effectual, would cause defendant to disregard and neglect a duty which it owes to the public, and thereby violates an obligation imposed upon it by law. That such would be the effect of the provision, if sustained, there can be no doubt.

There is nothing in Warren v. K. & D. M. R. Co., 41 Iowa, 484, in conflict with the conclusion we reach. That case involved the liability of the railway company for stock killed by it at a point where it had a right to fence. The company sought to escape liability on the ground that Bell, the owner of the pasture from which the stock escaped, had agreed with it to erect the fence and keep it in repair. But it was held that as the owner of the stock was neither the owner of the pasture nor his tenant, the defense was not good. It was said by the court that, if Bell had agreed to erect and maintain the fence, he could not have recovered damages to his stock which resulted from the want of a fence; but the plaintiff in this case assumed no burden which the law imposed upon defendant. The case of Simmonds v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 62 Conn. 271, 53 Am. Rep. 587, is in some respects somewhat similar in principle to that last cited.

The case of Marquette, H. & O. R. Co. v. Spahr, 44 Mich. 170, 38 Am. Rep. 242, also cited by appellee, involves a different question. It appeared in that case that the owners of a warehouse, of a railway track near it, and of a quantity of hay, employed a railway company to draw cars over the track for their accommodation. The engine employed to do the work was defective, and that fact was known to the owners aforesaid, who complained of it, but with that knowledge they continued to permit its use. It finally caused a fire, which destroyed the warehouse and hay. It was held that the owners of the property destroyed could not recover, for the reason that they had engaged the engine with knowledge of the defects which caused the loss. But in that case the plaintiffs not only owned the warehouse, but the track also, and the engine passed over that track, with their knowledge, and at their request, for their benefit. They knew in advance just what the danger to their property would be, and contributed to the result. But, putting upon the case a construction most favorable to appellee, and it is authority only for the doctrine that a railway company may exempt itself from liability to an individual on account of existing and known defect in its machinery. Whether that may be done is a question which does not arise in this case. The agreement under consideration does not seek to hold defendant harmless on account of known and specified defects in engines, or a manner of operating them, recognized to be negligent, but from "all liability for damages by fire" caused by cars or engines lawfully on the track, whatever the cause, whether then existing and known, or not then existing and not foreseen. It is our opinion for reasons stated, that the provision of the case in question is contrary to public policy, and void.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently granted, after which on February 8, 1894, Given J., delivered the following opinion:

A rehearing was granted in this case, and it is again submitted with further arguments. The facts disclosed by the pleadings, which are material to be considered, are sufficiently stated in the former opinion, and are as follows: "On the 30th day of April, 1890, the plaintiff Griswold owned a two and one-half story elevator building, warehouse, and corn-crib attached, together with engine and boiler connections and feed mill therein, all of which were situated on the depot grounds of defendant immediately north of its track, in the village of Winthrop. In the morning of the day named, the property described was totally destroyed by fire, which was kindled by sparks and cinders from a locomotive engine of defendant while passing on its track. The sparks and cinders escaped from the engine in consequence of defects in its construction and appliances, and in consequence of the negligent manner in which it was operated. The property destroyed was of the value of $6,000, and was, at the time, insured by the plaintiffs the Iowa State Insurance Company, the Commercial Union Assurance Company, Limited, the St. Paul German Insurance Company, and the Farmer's Fire Insurance Company in the sum of $1,000 each, or for the aggregate amount of $4,000. After the property was destroyed, each insurance company paid the amount of loss for which it was responsible, and, claiming that by reason of such payments they became subrogated to the rights of Griswold to the extent of the amounts so paid, they join him in demanding judgment against defendant for the value of the property destroyed. Griswold occupied the premises on which the property stood by virtue of a lease to him from defendant, which contained the following provisions:

'And the lessee, in consideration of the premises, hereby covenants and agrees with the lessor, its successors and assigns, to pay the said lessor, as rent for said premises, the sum of one dollar, to be paid at the time and in the manner following, to wit, on the delivery of this lease; and the lessee further covenants and agrees with the lessor that he will, from the date of this indenture, put to use and maintain a good substantial elevator, coal sheds, and lumber yard on the above-described premises; and further agrees to protect and save harmless said lessor from all liability for damage by fire, which in the operation of the lessor's railroad, or from cars and engines lawfully on its tracks, may accidentally or negligently be communicated to any property or structure on said described premises. And the said lessee hereby agrees to ship all grain, coal, and lumber he can control by the Illinois Central Railroad. And the said lessee further covenants and agrees with the said lessor that he will transact the business for which said buildings are erected and designed at fair and reasonable rates, and in a prompt and careful manner, so that neither the company nor the public will be prejudiced by reason of the said lessee dealing unfairly or negligently in their behalf, or in the transaction of the business connected with the grain, coal, and lumber building so erected as aforesaid.' The defendant claims that plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, for the reason that Griswold undertook, by the terms of the lease, to protect and save it harmless from such losses as that in question. The ground of the demurrer is as follows: 'The petition and answer show that the action is commenced by the owner and insurer of an elevator built upon defendant's land alongside of its track, for the purpose of handling grain, and that said elevator was burned through the negligence of defendant, its agents and employees. The plaintiffs therefore say it is against public policy, and contrary to the statutes of Iowa, for the defendant to attempt to restrict by contract its liability for the negligence of its agents, employees and servants; and that said defense, so far as it is based upon exemptions from liability by reason of this contract of lease, is not good, as such contract of exemption is void.' No special claims are made in behalf of the insurance companies; therefore, their interests, and that of Griswold, for the purposes of this appeal, will be treated as governed by the same rules."

1. It will be seen, from the statement of the case, that the controlling question is whether that clause in the lease whereby plaintiff Griswold agrees to protect and save harmless the defendant from all liability for damages by fire negligently communicated to the property on the leased premises in the operation of the railroad is void, as against public policy. The right to so contract as to fire accidentally communicated is not questioned, but only the right to so contract as to fire negligently communicated. Public policy is variable,—the very reverse of that which is the policy of the public at one time may become public policy another; hence, no fixed rule can be given by which to determine what is public policy. The authorities all agree that a contract is not void, as against public policy, unless it is injurious to the interests of the public, or contravenes some established interest of society. Public policy has been aptly described as "an unruly horse, and, when once you get astride, you never know where it will carry you." It was said by Wilmot, Ch. J.: "It is the duty of all courts to keep their eyes steadily upon the interests of the public, even in the determination of community justice, and when they find an action is founded upon a claim injurious to the public, and which has a bad tendency, to give no countenance or assistance in foro civili." Other courts have said: "We may take it as well settled that in the law of contracts the first purpose of the courts is to look to the welfare of the public, and, if the enforcement of the agreement would be inimical to its interest, no relief could be granted to the party injured, and even though it might result beneficially to the party who made and violated the agreement. The common law will not permit individuals to oblige themselves by a contract either to do, or not to do, anything, when the thing to be done or omitted is in any degree clearly injurious to the public." Again, it is said: "It must not be forgotten that you are not to extend arbitrarily those rules which say that a given contract is void as being against public policy, because, if there is one thing more than another which public policy requires, it is that men of full age and competent understanding shall have the utmost liberty of contracting, and that their contracts, when entered into fairly and voluntarily, shall be held sacred, and shall be enforced by courts of justice. Therefore, you have this paramount public policy to consider, that you are not likely to interfere with this freedom of contract." Eserton v. Brownlow, 4 H. L. Cas. 1, 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 875, note 3; Boardman v. Thompson, 25 Iowa, 501.

Aided by these definitions and cautions, we proceed again to inquire whether the clause of the agreement in question, if carried into effect, would be injurious to any interest of the public, or, in other words, whether the public has any interest in this provision of the contract. The conclusion of the former opinion is "that the provision, if effectual, would cause the defendant to disregard and neglect a duty which it owes to the public, and thereby violate an obligation imposed upon it by law." This conclusion rests, in part at least, upon holding that sections 1289 and 1808 of the Code are applicable to the question under consideration, and that the defendant owed it as a duty to the public to operate its road with care with respect to plaintiff's property. The discussion on rehearing leads us to inquire whether, under the law and facts, it is correct to say that the defendant owed any duty to the public with respect to the plaintiff's property. The former opinion holds correctly that the liability of railroad corporations, under section 1289, for negligently setting out fires, is absolute, and that the obligation on the part of the railroad companies to exercise care is towards the public; but the question remains whether that section applies to cases like this, or, in other words, whether it established any interest in the public, or imposed any duty upon the defendant towards the public, in respect of the property of the plaintiff. The defendant owed no duty to the public to exercise care with respect to its own buildings situated on its right of way, and incurred no liability for their negligent burning, unless the fire spread beyond its own premises. The operation of a railway increases the danger from fire to the property of the people situated on their own premises, where they have the right to have it, and hence the provision of section 1289 making the corporation operating the railway absolutely liable for all damages by fire that is negligently set out or caused by the operation of the railway. As to such property the railway company owes to the public the duty of care, and the public has an interest in the performance of that duty. Therefore, a contract that exempts from that duty to the public would be injurious to the public interests, and against public policy. The plaintiff Griswold's buildings were not upon his own premises, nor where he had a right to have them, independent of the defendant; they were upon the right of way, where they could only be by its permission. In granting the permission, and in placing the buildings there, both parties knew of the increased hazard of the location from fire communicated either through accident or negligence in the operation of the road. They knew that the defendant corporation could only act through its officers, agents, and employes, and that these might be negligent in the performance of their duties. The plaintiff had an insurable interest, and could, as he did, protect himself, in part at least, against loss by either accident or negligence. The defendant had no insurable interest, and could only protect itself from the hazard by refusing consent, or by contracting for indemnity, as it did. Plaintiff Griswold contracted with his coplaintiffs, the insurance companies, for indemnity against loss by fire, whether caused by accident or negligence. The fire occurred through neglect, and the insurance companies, as they were bound to do, paid the insurance. Those contracts, like this, were for indemnity against liability by fire, whether caused by accident or negligence. Many losses by fire occur through the negligence of the insured or his family, and recovery is had unless the negligence was willful. While these policies are not before us, we may assume, we think, that under them the plaintiff Griswold would have been entitled to recover, even though the loss had occurred through his own negligence, unless it was willful. The public had no interest in these contracts of insurance between the plaintiffs; nor were they against public policy, because the companies agreed to indemnify the assured against loss caused by his own negligence. This is not a question whether, under section 1289, the defendant would be liable to Griswold for negligently communicating fire to this property in the absence of a contract to the contrary, but it is whether the public has any interest that this contract contravenes. It seems to us now quite clear that as these buildings could only be placed upon the defendant's right of way by its consent, and were so placed upon the premises, and on the conditions expressed in the lease, the public had no interest therein, under said section 1289 or otherwise, that would be injured by giving effect to the agreement in question. Much as the public may have been interested in the convenience of such a place of business, it had no interest as to who should carry the hazard incident to that property being located as it was. The fact that the defendant acquired this right of way in the exercise of the right of eminent domain did not preclude it from granting or withholding permission to the plaintiff to build thereon, nor the parties from contracting as to which should bear the hazard incident to the location.

2. It is contended that the defendant entered into this contract in its capacity as a common carrier, and therefore we must apply to the consideration of the question section 1308, providing, in effect, that carriers of persons or property cannot exempt themselves from liability by contract which would exist had no contract been made. It is undoubtedly true that the ultimate purpose of the defendant in entering into this contract was the promotion of its business as a common carrier. But the contract is not for the carriage of persons or property. That the ultimate purpose was to increase its business as a carrier does not make this a contract for carriage any more than would be the employment of workmen in its shops, warehouses, or elsewhere apart from the operation of the road. Upon further consideration we are of the opinion that this contract was not made by the defendant in its capacity as a common carrier, and that the provision of section 1308 is not applicable. Johnson v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 86 Va. 975, and other cases involving contracts of exemption from liability for causing injuries to, or death of, persons, are not applicable. The public has an interest in the life and safety of every human being, and every such contract is clearly injurious to public interest, but not always so as to property.

3. In the lease the plaintiff Griswold agrees "that he will transact the business for which said buildings are erected and designed at fair and reasonable rates, and in a prompt and careful manner, so that neither the company nor the public will be prejudiced by reason of the said lessee dealing unfairly or negligently in their behalf, or in the transaction of the business connected with the grain, coal, and lumber building so erected as aforesaid." While it is evident the parties contemplated a place for dealing with the public, in the maintenance and management of which the public might be interested, neither that interest nor Mr. Griswold's agreement gave the public any interest as to who should bear the hazard of the loss of the buildings by fire. The plaintiff indemnified himself against the loss, in part at least, by insurance, and the insurance companies have paid him, as they were bound to do. Surely, public policy does not demand that the defendant shall now reimburse these insurance companies for the payments they were bound to make by their own contract, and which the defendant has never promised to repay. As to the claim of the plaintiff Griswold to recover the excess of the loss over the amount of insurance, public policy answers, "You must stand by your contract." After a careful review of the case, we reach the conclusion that the public had no interest in the clause of the contract in question, that its enforcement works no injury to any interest of the public, and that the judgment of the district court should be affirmed.

Robinson, J., dissenting:

I cannot assent to the conclusions of the foregoing opinion that the agreement in question was effectual to relieve the defendant of liability for negligently setting fire to and destroying the property of the plaintiff. Something has been said on rehearing in regard to the liability of the defendant to the insurance companies and their right to recover; but as no question in regard to such liability and right of recovery, as distinguished from the liability of defendant to Griswold for the loss he sustained, for which he has not been compensated, is presented by the pleadings, or was argued on the first submission of the case, it should not, as it seems to me, be given weight now. It is well settled that, in a civil case, a party cannot, on rehearing, make a case different from that presented on the original submission. McDermott v. Iowa Falls & S. O. R. Co. 85 Iowa, 180, and cases therein cited. It follows that the only questions which we should now consider are those involved in determining the character and effect of the provisions of the case in question, and the right of Griswold to recover, without regard to the interests of the insurance companies. On the rehearing we have been favored with elaborate arguments by representatives of several of the leading railway corporations doing business in the state, and in explanation it is said that the questions involved are of interest to all railway companies in the state, and that the former opinion, if adhered to, will seriously affect their management and business. It is probably fair to presume that leases with provisions similar to the one in controversy are now, or soon will be, in general use in the state, and that the questions involved are of interest to the large number of persons who are now, or shall hereafter be, concerned in buildings and property located on land owned by railway corporations by virtue of leases from the corporations. The importance of the questions to the railways and to people doing business with them is apparent. It does not seem to me that the authorities cited in the opinion of the majority justify the conclusions they reach. Section 1289 of the Code provides that "any corporation operating a railway shall be liable for all damages by fire that is set out or caused by operating of any such railway. . . ." It was said in West v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 77 Iowa, 654, that this statute imposes an absolute liability upon railway corporations without regard to the contributory negligence of the person injured, for damages resulting from fires set out or caused by negligently operating their railways. The facts admitted in this case show that the fire in question was caused by defendant in operating its railway, and that the fire was the result of negligence on its part. Whether a railway company may limit its liability for a fire which it causes without fault on its part is a question not involved in this case; but we are required to determine whether a railway company may, by a contract entered into before the act, limit its liability for a fire which is caused by negligence on its part in operating its railway. Section 1808 of the Code provides, in effect, that a common carrier or carrier of passengers cannot exempt itself from liability, as such carrier, by contract. Although there is some conflict in the authorities, yet it is the general rule, in the absence of statutory regulations, that railway companies cannot restrict their liability for negligence in transporting passengers or freight by contracts made in advance of the carriage; and the same is true in regard to the power of telegraph companies to limit their liability for negligence in transmitting dispatches. It is said in Cooley on Torts (page 687), with reference to agreements of that kind, that "the cases of carriers and telegraph companies have been specially mentioned, because it is chiefly in these cases that such contracts are met with. But, although the reasons which forbid such contracts have special force in the business of carrying persons and goods, or of sending messages, they apply universally, and should be held to defeat all contracts by which a party undertakes to put another at the mercy of his own faulty conduct." In Johnson v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 86 Va. 975, the administrator sought to recover damages for the death of his intestate, which was claimed to have been caused by the negligence of the railway company. The decedent had been a member of a firm of quarry men, which agreed with the railway company to remove a certain granite bluff from its right of way. He was killed by a train of the company while he was engaged in doing the work required by the agreement. There was evidence which tended to show that the accident was caused by negligence on the part of the company. It claimed exemption from liability, however, on the ground that the agreement provided that it should "in no way be held responsible for any injuries to, or death of, any of the members of the said firm, or of any of its agents or employees, sustained from said work, should such death or injury occur from any cause whatsoever." The court, in commenting on this provision of the agreement, said: "To uphold the stipulation in question would be to hold that it was competent for one party to put the other parties to the contract at the mercy of its own misconduct, which can never be lawfully done where an enlightened system of jurisprudence prevails. Public policy forbids it, and contracts against the public policy are void. Nothing is better settled—certainly in this court—than that a common carrier cannot, by contract, exempt himself from responsibility for his own or his servant's negligence in the carriage of goods or passengers for hire. This is so, independently of section 1296 of the Code, and the principle which invalidates a stipulation for exemption from liability for one's own negligence is not confined to the contracts of carriers as such. It applies universally."

Railway corporations are quasi public agencies, and perform a public duty. They are agencies created by the state with certain privileges, and subject to certain obligations. A 24 L. R. A.

contract that they will not discharge their obligations is a breach of a public duty, and cannot be enforced. St. Joseph & D. C. R. Co. v. Ryan, 11 Kan. 609, 15 Am. Rep. 357. An agreement by which a railway corporation undertakes, without the consent of the state, to relieve itself of a burden which is imposed upon it by law, is void, as against public policy. Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 71, 25 L. ed. 950. Among the obligations imposed upon a railway corporation is that of using reasonable diligence in furnishing its road with safe equipments, including locomotive engines, and of operating its road without negligence. That is a duty which it owes to the public, and any agreement which tends to lessen the diligence and care with which it furnishes and operates its road is, to that extent, against public policy. The contract entered into between Griswold and defendant was not for carriage, and primarily it was for the benefit of the parties to it, and not in the interest of the public. But it is clear that its purpose on the part of defendant was to benefit and promote its business as a carrier. The nominal sum of one dollar was not the consideration which induced it to enter into the agreement. Elevators, coal sheds, and lumber yards are important aids to a railway engaged in carrying grain, coal, and lumber, in securing and transacting that branch of its business; and the promise of Griswold to maintain and use them, and to ship all grain, coal, and lumber he could control over defendant's road, and the prospect for business which the existence and use of the improvements named held out to defendant, were no doubt important and controlling considerations which induced it to execute the lease. Those improvements were not only of value to the defendant, but they were important to all who bought or sold or stored commodities which were received in them. In other words, the lease was a means to promote the end for which the road of defendant was built and operated, and the public was interested in the improvements for which it provided, to the extent to which it patronized them. Its interest may not have been a distinct entity, capable of enforcement at the suit of any citizen, but it was one which the law recognizes, and which it will, in a suitable case, protect. The lease itself fully recognizes an interest of the public in its subject-matter. It provides that the lessee "shall transact the business for which said buildings are erected and designed, at fair and reasonable rates, and in a prompt and careful manner, so that neither the company nor the public will be prejudiced by reason of the said lessee dealing unfairly or negligently in their behalf, or in the transaction of the business connected with the grain, coal, and lumber building so erected as aforesaid." It is true that a contract is not void, as against the public policy, unless it is injurious to the interests of the public, or tends to have that effect, or contravenes some established interest of society. But, when a contract belongs to one of those classes, it will be declared void, although in a particular instance no injury to the public may result. 5 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 2392. "A contract invading any one of the other interests which the law cherishes, though to do what is neither indictable nor prohibited by a statute, termed a 'contract against public policy' (or sound policy), is likewise void." Bishop, Cont. § 473. To justify the conclusion that the provision under consideration is void, it is only necessary to find that the provision, if effectual, would cause, or tend to cause, the defendant to disregard or neglect a duty which it owes to the public, and thereby violate an obligation imposed upon it by law. That such would be the effect of the provision, if sustained, does not appear to me to be doubtful. It was not intended merely to require Griswold to bear the loss which should result from the hazards to which his property should be exposed by operating the railway with reasonable prudence and care, but it was intended to exempt the defendant from all liability for damages from fire which should be caused in operating its railway without regard to acts of negligence, or lack of precaution and care on its part, which should contribute to the loss. The agreement sought to exempt the defendant from liability for negligence, whatever its nature, which should be involved in the management of its railway. Such negligence might be manifested in many ways,—as, in the use of insufficient or defective machinery, in the employment of careless or incompetent trainmen, or in having an insufficient number of trainmen,—and was necessarily of a kind to affect the business of defendant as a common carrier. The tendency of the agreement was to make the defendant, in keeping its locomotive engines in good order, in adopting improvements to prevent the escape of fire, and in selecting its employes, less diligent than it would otherwise have been, and thus to expose, not only the property of Griswold, but all other property of a combustible kind located upon its grounds, to dangers which reasonable care on its part would have prevented. The tendency of the agreement is more clearly seen when the probable aggregate effect of such agreements, entered into between defendant and all the tenants on its right of way and depot grounds in the state, is considered. To keep in good order the machinery and appurtenances of a railway, and to operate it in the manner which reasonable prudence demands, involve the expenditure of large sums of money, and the constant exercise of skill and care by railroad employes. Whatever tends to lessen the degree of care used in operating a railway is to that extent inimical to public interest, and contrary to public policy. Combustible property on the depot and right of way grounds of a railway company is of necessity more exposed to danger from fire caused by operating the railway than property outside of their limits, and if it can, by agreement, protect itself against liability for negligently destroying the property on its grounds, the common experience of mankind, as applied to other matters, teaches us that the natural effect of such an agreement is to lessen the care and diligence the railway company will use to prevent such negligence and the consequent loss. It follows that each tenant is interested in the agreement of every other tenant on the same line or division of railway, and that the people who store property in the buildings of such tenants, or who are concerned in grain, coal, lumber, and other articles which are received in, or delivered from such buildings, are also interested in the agreements.

It does not seem to me that the law which governs ordinary contracts of insurance is applicable to this case. In such contracts the property owner is never, in terms, insured against the consequences of his own negligence. On the contrary, great care is taken to guard against and prevent negligence on his part. Insurance to the full value of the property is not given, and all inducement to negligence on his part is withheld. If loss result from his negligence, as a rule, he and the insurance company, only, are affected, his negligence not being of a character to affect the public. I am not aware that an agreement to insure a person against the consequences of his own negligence, the natural and probable effect of which would be to encourage such negligence to the danger and prejudice of others, is sustained by the courts. It is true that the public has no interest in the damages in controversy in this action, but it had an interest in the agreement in question so far as it tended to induce negligence on the part of defendant in operating its railway; and as negligence of that kind was the natural and probable effect of the agreement, and as the agreement is not separable, it would seem to follow that it should be held void. This conclusion is not only in entire harmony with the authorities cited in the opinion of the majority, but, as it seems to me, is required by them, as well as by the authorities cited in this dissent.

Whether the defendant owed to the public any duty in regard to its own buildings, whether the defendant had any insurable interest in the property of Griswold which was destroyed, and whether the insurance companies are entitled to recover the amounts they have paid to Griswold, are questions which do not appear to me to be so presented as to make it proper for us to determine them on this appeal, and in regard to them I express no opinion.

Kinne, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. These three cases involve the same questions, and are submitted together for one opinion. The petition in each case charges, in substance, that the defendant society is a corporation organized and transacting business under the laws of this state; that on September 2, 1891, and during the annual exhibition of the society, the other defendants, as its officers and agents, and by its authority, did arrest, restrain, and commit an assault upon the plaintiffs, to their damage in the sum of $5,000. To these petitions demurrers were filed on the ground that the alleged wrongful acts committed against plaintiffs were not shown to be within the scope of the employment of the persons committing such acts, but were in fact committed outside the scope of their duties. The lower court sustained the demurrers, and plaintiffs elected to stand on their petitions, and excepted in each case to the ruling of the court.

2. The only question for us to determine is as to the liability of the society for the acts complained of; and at the outset it is important to have in mind that the society is in no sense a corporation for pecuniary profit. It is an agency of the state. It exists for the sole purpose of promoting the public interest in the business of agriculture. Its public character more fully appears when we consider that its organization is provided for by statute; that it has no stockholders; that by law the president of each county agricultural society in the state, or other delegate therefrom, duly authorized, is made a member of the board of directors; that said board is required to make annual reports to the governor, which are to be distributed throughout the state; that the powers of the board are prescribed by statute. Code, §§ 1108-1109, 1114-1116, inclusive. The society is empowered by law to arrest persons for selling intoxicating liquors, and for gambling and horse racing within its grounds. Id. §§ 1114, 1116. No other authority to arrest or detain persons is given to the society, and the arrests and detentions in the cases at bar were not for any of the causes above specified. It seems to us, then, that in doing the acts complained of the defendants were not acting within the scope of the powers which the society could confer upon them. Such acts were entirely foreign to the purposes for which the society was organized. It was not authorized to enforce the criminal statutes of the state generally. The directors of the society had no power to do the acts complained of in its behalf, and hence could not so authorize others to perform them as to bind the society. In any case, as the directors of the corporation are only its agents for the promotion of its business within the legitimate scope of the purpose for which it is created, any attempt on their part to confer authority on their agents or servants to do an act without the scope of the corporate business would not be binding upon the corporation. Brokaw v. New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. 82 N. J. L. 328, 9 Am. Dec. 659; Gillette v. Missouri Valley R. Co. 55 Mo. 315, 17 Am. Rep. 653. Again, it is a general rule that in determining the liability of the principal for an act committed by the agent we must take into consideration the character of the corporation, its organization, the scope of the authority of the agent who committed the tort, and the character of the business in which he was employed. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 780; Miller v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 8 Neb. 219. The case of Baths v. Decatur County Agr. Soc., 78 Iowa, 11, is in principle applicable to the case at bar. In that case it was held that the society was not liable for injuries sustained by the plaintiff on account of the negligence of a person employed to convey people to the fair grounds, as it did not appear that the officers of the society were authorized to employ hackmen to convey persons to the grounds of the society.

3. Not being a corporation for pecuniary profit, the defendant society's liability is not controlled by the rules of law applicable thereto. The society is an arm or agency of the state, organized for the promotion of the public good, and for the advancement of the agricultural interests of the state. It would be manifestly wrong to permit its funds to be used to pay damages arising out of the commission of wrongful acts by its officers and servants, and which are in no wise connected with the object and purpose of the society's creation. In Cutwell v. Boone, 51 Iowa, 687, 33 Am. Rep. 154, the action was for damages against the marshal of the city for an assault and battery, and for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution. It was charged that the marshal, under the pretense of enforcing an ordinance, committed the acts complained of. This court held that the city could not be made liable for the illegal acts of its officers. So here defendant society, not being a corporation for pecuniary profit, and being one of the agencies of the state, can no more be made liable for the willful and illegal acts of its agents than a city or school district, and especially so when, as in this case, the acts complained of were not within the scope of the purposes for which the society was created. The demurrers were properly sustained.

Affirmed.

Deceased,

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC
R. CO., Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. A rule of a railroad company printed on a time table warning employees against certain risks, with a notice that they will have no claim for injuries received in consequence of taking such risks, is admissible in evidence against an employé suing for injuries and charged with violating the rule.
2. The defense of contributory negligence is not defeated, although the burden of proof is thrown on the defendant by Code, § 1226, providing that an injured party in order to recover damages from a railroad company for neglect or refusal to comply with the statute requiring safe crossings and cattle-guards, need only prove such neglect and refusal.
3. A railroad company, although required by law to erect and maintain a cattle-guard at a certain point, must make it safe as a crossing for employées. If it so locates its switch yards that they are constantly required to cross it.
4. Evidence that another employé had made complaint is inadmissible on the question of the employé's complaints of defects and promises to him to repair them.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Cedar County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cook & Dodge and Wolf & Hanley, for appellant:

Even if the rule were only "advisory," it was competent evidence to go to the jury in connection with other facts as to intestate's negligence.

There is only one purpose for which a cattle-guard is or can be required, viz.: to prevent animals coming upon the track at points where a fence cannot be constructed to keep them off.

The rule is different in Indiana.

Pennsylvania Co. v. Lindley, 3 Ind. App. 111, citing Pennsylvania Co. v. Mitchell, 124 Ind. 478; Mt. Wayne, C. & L. R. Co. v. Herbold, 99 Ind. 91.

NOTE.—Disobedience of master's rules as contributory negligence.

The disobedience by a servant of a rule which his master has established to promote his safety in the prosecution of the work assigned to him will preclude his holding the master responsible for a resulting injury if he has notice of the rule which is at the time applicable to him and to the duty to be performed and has not been waived or abrogated, and if the disobedience is unnecessary and contributes to the injury.

Rules binding on employées.

One engaged to work for a master who has established a set of rules for the government of employées, which are made known to him, contracts to do the work according to such rules; and if he does not follow the rules and is injured, the master is not liable to him for the injury, unless it is shown that the work could not have been done by following the rules. Pennsylvania Co. v. Whitcomb, 111 Ind. 212.

Disobedience of rules is always a defense to an action by a servant against his master, unless there are facts which, in the particular instance, excuse the employé or relieve him from the duty of strict obedience. Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Lang, 118 Ind. 579.

If a violation of a rule in whole or in part causes the accident, there can be no recovery. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Wallace, 76 Tex. 686.

Disobedience of rules will bar recovery, unless it is shown that such disobedience did not contribute directly or indirectly in any degree to the injury. Prather v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 80 Ga. 427.

The general rule is if there is nothing exceptional in the case to deny a recovery. Lyon v. Detroit, L. & L. M. R. Co. 31 Mich. 429; Sutherland v. Troy & B. R. Co. 74 Hun, 162; Wert v. Keim, 2 Pa. Co. Ct. Rev. 405; Gulf, W. T. & P. R. Co. v. Ryan, 69 Tex. 665; Harris v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 88 Va. 560; Sheeler v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 81 Va. 188, 59 Am. Rep. 664; Overby v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 37 W. Va. 524.

Examples.

An attempt to couple a car having a twisted draw-bar will defeat recovery by one who had in his possession the printed rules of the company forbidding an attempt to make a coupling, unless the draw-heads were known to be in good condition. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Rice, 4 L. R. A. 178, 51 Ark. 467.

The conductor of a train is not entitled to rely on signals not given in accordance with the rules of the company. Columbus & W. R. Co. v. Bridges, 86 Ala. 448.

Disobedience of a rule to use a coupling stick to couple cars will prevent recovery. Russell v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 47 Fed. Rep. 204; Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Free, 97 Ala. 281.

So voluntary violation of a rule prohibiting employées to put their hands beneath a stamping press simply because by so doing work could be turned out faster will prevent a recovery for an injury thereby received. Cullen v. National Sheet Metal Roof. Co. 114 N. Y. 45.

An employé on a railroad must obey a general rule to be prepared at all times for special or irregular trains. Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Lang, 118 Ind. 579.

And in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Martin (N. M.) Aug. 16, 1893, a judgment in favor of plaintiff was reversed because of his negligence to comply with a rule that "every man at work on the track must bear in mind that in operating the road under telegraphic orders a train may pass at any time."

Violation of the rule against running faster than a certain speed per hour will defeat a recovery. Sutherland v. Troy & B. R. Co. 74 Hun, 162; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Kane (Ga.) 22 L. R. A. 85; Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Folks, 76 Ga. 527; Rowland v. Cannon, 85 Ga. 105.

So will running past switches at prohibited speed. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Thomas, 51 Miss. 637.

So will failure to put up signal when at work under a car. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Kitchens, 88 Ga. 83.

Starting from a terminal point behind the schedule time, when the rules of the road require running on schedule time, will prevent a recovery for an accident caused thereby. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. McDade, 59 Ga. 73; McDade v. Georgia R. Co. 60 Ga. 119.

The statutory requirement cannot be changed by the use which may be made of the part of the track where the cattle-guard is placed.

There was in this case no neglect or refusal of the defendant to construct and maintain a good, sufficient, and safe crossing and cattle-guard, and under the established facts, the defense of contributory negligence is available. Under section 1288 of the Code, the contributory negligence of any injured party may be shown as a defense. So far as we can find, this question has never been directly decided by this court.

Payne v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 44 Iowa, 236; Lang v. Holiday Creek R. & Coal Min. Co. 49 Iowa, 469; Moriarty v. Central Iowa R. Co. 64 Iowa, 696.

Section 1288 contains no provision in regard to the willful act of the injured party. The importance of the provision as to the willful act, as affecting the construction of the section, is shown by reference to—

Spence v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 25 Iowa, 189; Aylesworth v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 80 Iowa, 459.

The issue was whether or not Ford had made any complaint, and had received any promise which induced him to continue to work and upon which he had the right to rely. The complaints which others might make and the promises or refusals to them to remove the cattle-guard could in no way affect that issued. Stoutenburgh v. Dow, 83 Iowa, 179.

The defendant was not required to adopt every or any new device until its utility had been sufficiently tested, and it appeared to be, as a whole, better than the appliance in use.

Burns v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 69 Iowa, 450, 58 Am. Rep. 227.

Messrs. Wheeler & Moffit for appellee.

Kinne, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Plaintiff's intestate, H. P. Ford, was, on and prior to December 18, 1890, employed by the defendant as a yard switchman and brakeman in its yards at West Liberty, Iowa. He had been in defendant's employ for over five years, though he had been engaged in this yard service for only three months prior to his death. He was forty-five years old, of good habits and character, had been recently married. He was earning $45 per month. His duties required him to couple and uncouple cars, and assist in making up trains under the direction of the yardmaster. The east switch in said yards is about 90 feet west of the east line of Columbus street. Defendant's main track crosses said street at a right angle, and

So will carrying more steam in the engine than the rules allow. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Houck, 72 Ill. 285.

And riding on locomotive. Abend v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 111 Ill. 202, 53 Am. Rep. 616.

And coupling cars in motion. Darracott v. Chesapeake & D. R. Co. 83 Va. 288; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Smith, 89 Tenn. 114.

So if a rule forbids trying to couple cars while in motion, a trainman cannot recover if injured by being brushed from the side of the car by another car standing too near the track, if he had gone down the side ladder for the purpose of uncoupling the cars before they stop. Schaub v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 106 Mo. 74.

If a conductor is on top of his train contrary to the rules of the company, he cannot recover for an injury there received. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Wallace, 76 Tex. 636.

So leaving the place where the rules required him to be on the train will defeat a recovery. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wilson, 88 Tenn. 816.

But disobedience of a conductor of a rule requiring him under certain circumstances to be on a certain part of his train will not bar recovery if he left for the purpose of communicating instructions to the engineer as to possible obstructions at a point on the track a short distance ahead. Somerset & C. R. Co. v. Galbraith, 109 Pa. 82.

Disobedience of a rule forbidding going between moving cars to couple them will defeat recovery. Grand v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 11 L. R. A. 402, 83 Mich. 564.

Or going between any cars. Johnson v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 88 W. Va. 208; Pryor v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 90 Ala. 32; Georgia Pac. R. Co. v. Propst, 83 Ala. 518; Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Graham, 94 Ala. 645.

Riding on the engine in violation of the rules for purposes of his own to gain information about his work will prevent a recovery for injuries received while there. McGucken v. Western New York & P. R. Co. 77 Hun. 69.

So of a switchman's disregard of a rule not to board a train while in motion after throwing a switch, but to follow the train until it stops before 24 L. R. A.

getting on. Chambers v. Western N. C. R. Co. 91 N. C. 475.

Or of a rule that one coupling car should stoop below the bottoms of them. Northern Cent. R. Co. v. Hueson, 101 Pa. 1, 47 Am. Rep. 690.

Or forbidding jumping on switch engines while in motion. Francis v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. R. Co. 110 Mo. 387.

Or a requirement to examine couplings before attempting to couple cars. Karrer v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 76 Mich. 400.

Or against cleaning machine while in motion. Shanny v. Androscoggin Mills, 66 Me. 420.

So of a conductor's failure to send back signals upon the stopping of his train. Dow v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 22 N. Y. Week. Dig. 288.

Failure of a brakeman to test the brakes before the starting of his train will prevent his recovery for an injury caused by their defective condition, if sufficient time was allowed for that purpose. La Croy v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 132 N. Y. 570.

But a rule requiring train men to make personal inspection of the cars which come into their trains will not relieve the company from its liability to furnish safe machinery,—especially if neither time nor appliances are allowed in and by which to make the inspection. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Fry, 121 Ind. 819.

Exceptions.

The rules of the company are not binding on the employes (1) if not brought to his attention; (2) habitually disregarded with knowledge and acquiescence of superior officers; (3) when usage of master tends to mislead in violation of the rules. Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. v. Leverett, 48 Ark. 333.

If the master permits such a departure from the established rule as to create uncertainty as to its operation, and injury results, he cannot take advantage of its violation in the particular case. Silver Cord Combination Min. Co. v. McDonald, 14 Colo. 191.

Notice.

To bar a recovery there must have been knowledge of the rule. Georgia Pac. R. Co. v. Davis, 98 the east line of the street enters upon defendant's inclosed right of way; and at this point defendant had erected and maintained a cattle-guard, which was constructed of ties or timbers laid crosswise of the track, with open spaces between the same, about eight inches wide, covering an open ditch, about three feet deep. Prior to his death, Ford well knew the location and character of the cattle guard, and frequently passed over it. On December 13, 1890, deceased was engaged with the engineer and fireman of the switch engine, and with another brakeman (all servants of the defendant), in switching some cars from a point east of the cattle-guard to the switches west of said guard. At a point about 75 feet west of the cattle guard, Ford stepped between two of the moving cars to uncouple them. The pin which he tried to pull stuck, and he took another pin, and attempted to pound out the stuck pin,—the cars moving at such speed that Ford could walk between them along the track,—and, while thus engaged in trying to uncouple the cars, Ford stepped between the ties of the cattle-guard, and was instantly killed by the cars running over him. The above facts are undisputed. Other facts which we think may be treated as established will be considered hereafter. The negligence charged is in not constructing and maintaining "a good, safe, and sufficient cattle-guard, as by statute provided." It is also averred that plaintiff's intestate did not contribute by his negligence to produce his death. The answer takes issue on the averments of the petition that the intestate was not guilty of contributory negligence; charges that intestate, with full knowledge of the condition of the cattle-guard, remained in defendant's service, and the risk incurred was incident to the service which intestate contracted to perform; that intestate gave the signal on which the train was being moved when the accident occurred, and the intestate then had full control of the train; that intestate negligently, and in violation of the rules of defendant, went between the cars while in motion to uncouple them. In a reply, plaintiff pleads notice to defendant as to the dangerous condition of the cattle-guard, and its agreement to fix the same, as an excuse for continuing in its service; denies that the danger intestate incurred was a risk incident to the service which he contracted to perform; says the rule pleaded by defendant was advisory only, and had been abrogated. The case was tried by the court below upon the theory that it was incumbent upon defendant to maintain a good, sufficient, and safe cattle-guard at the place where it was located, for the uses and purposes for which defendant habitually used

An employé is not bound by a rule which has neither been communicated to him by it nor brought to his knowledge otherwise. Carroll v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 6 L. R. A. 214, 82 Ga. 452.

There is no liability if the rule was not properly published or brought to his attention. Fay v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 30 Minn. 281.

There is some difference of opinion as to the presumptions as to the employé's knowledge of the rule. One class of cases seems to place the active duty of instruction on the master while the other requires the duty of activity upon the servant.

On the one side it is said that—

In case of a brakeman, it is the duty of the master to call his attention to written or printed rules, and either furnish him with copies or inform him where he will find them. La Croy v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 57 Hun, 67.

To charge a servant with negligence for violation of a rule, it must be shown to have been brought to his notice. Mackey v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 18 Wash. L. Rep. 797, 8 Mackey, 232.

Evidence that a person had in his possession a paper containing printed regulations for the guidance of employés is not conclusive evidence that the contents were known to him. Bradley v. Salmon Falls Mfg. Co. 30 N. H. 487.

On the other side it is said that—

It will be presumed that information of the rules was given to the employé in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Pilkinton v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 70 Tex. 226.

If the rules have been extensively distributed and posted the presumption will be that the employés have notice of them. Alcorn v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (Mo.) May 11, 1891.

Notice of a rule cannot be presumed as matter of law from the fact that it was kept in an order book which was kept in a proper place, and was also printed and posted in conspicuous places, where the duties of employés called them. Francis v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 110 Mo. 387.

A trainman under a section foreman to whom a copy of the rules has been given will be presumed to have known of the rules, and if he has had a reasonable opportunity to become acquainted with them, it will be equivalent to actual knowledge. Shenandoah Valley R. Co. v. Lucado, 86 Va. 390.

If the injured person knew that his act was against the rules of the company, it will be no relief to him that he had never seen the particular rule on the subject and that it had not been read to him. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Thomason (Ala.) Feb. 2, 1893.

Ignorance of rules is no excuse for the conductor of a train because it is his duty to acquaint himself with the rules under which he is to operate his train. Alexander v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 38 Ky. 639.

The question of knowledge on the part of the injured person of the rule may be somewhat qualified by the rule as to negligence of fellow servants, there being a tendency to hold that his want of knowledge is immaterial, if the accident was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant who had knowledge of the rule, as in the case of Durgin v. Munson, 9 Allen, 398, 85 Am. Dec. 770, but that question will be treated in a future note.

The rule must not have been waived.

A recovery will not be precluded by violation of a rule which was habitually violated, and which, from the inconvenience which would result from its enforcement, must be presumed not to have been intended to be enforced under the circumstances existing at the time of the accident. Atkyn v. Wabash R. Co. 41 Fed. Rep. 193.

Habitually permitting switchmen to ride in the cab on the locomotive is a waiver as to them of a

it; that, if there was a neglect of defendant in constructing and maintaining a cattle-guard, then any contributory negligence of intestate would not defeat a recovery.

2. Defendant offered in evidence a time-table of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company for lines east of the Missouri river, Iowa division (which took effect October 19, 1890), with the printed rules attached thereto, and offered rule 31, printed on said time-table, which reads: "31. Employés are warned against taking risks in getting on or off trains or engines while in motion. In entering between cars to uncouple them while in motion, or in handling tools or machinery of any kind. They must protect themselves from personal injury by avoiding risks. Any employé who is careless of others, or himself, shall be liable to discharge from further service. Employés who may receive personal injuries in consequence of taking risks are hereby notified that they will have no claim on the company." This evidence was objected to—First, because the rule was merely advisory; second, that its violation by an employé is no defense in such an action, unless in its violation the employé is guilty of negligence proximately contributing to his injury; and, third, that under Code, § 1288, the defense of contributory negligence is barred. It is conceded that the time-table and rule printed thereon and offered was in force when intestate was killed, and no objection was made as to the manner of proving the rule, and it is also agreed that intestate had knowledge of the rule since October 19, 1890. The objections were sustained, and an exception taken. We think the court erred in its ruling. This rule may in one sense be said to be advisory, yet it is more than that. It is a plain and positive direction to the employé not to take any risk in the manner stated therein. It was material as affecting the question of the intestate's negligence, and should have been admitted. If, as is claimed, it was abrogated by acts of the employés known to the proper officers, that would be a matter for the consideration of the jury under the evidence, but would not affect the question of its admissibility. While such rules cannot be made a means of legal escape from liability by the company, when they are not made with the expectation of being enforced, still a rule like that offered, made in good faith, and with the intention of being enforced, and having for its object the prevention of injuries to employés, is in the interest of humanity, and serves a useful purpose. The ground of the objection upon which the rule was excluded seems to rule posted there that none but engineers and firemen are allowed to ride there. Smith v. Memphis & L. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 304.

A rule requiring the use of a stick in coupling cars will not bar a recovery by one injured while coupling without it, if for years it had been abandoned and it was not required for safety. Newport News & M. V. R. Co. v. Campbell, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 714.

So neglect to comply with a rule requiring the use of a stick to couple cars will not bar a recovery, if the injured person was told at the time his attention was called to the rule that the exacting a promise to use it was a mere form, and the use of the appliance for carrying it was attended with more danger than the attempt to couple without it. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Foley, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 17.

A rule forbidding switchmen to go between cars to couple them does not apply, where a running-board is attached to an engine for the express purpose of enabling switchmen to ride upon it. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Jones, 22 Ala. 218.

A rule requiring engineers to have their engines always completely under control may be waived by fixing a schedule of time for a train which cannot be made if such a rule is obeyed. Hall v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. 46 Minn. 439.

A car repairer may rely on the promise of the master's vice-principal to protect him while he is under the car and need not set the signals required by the rules. Moore v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 85 Mo. 588.

The custom to permit the fireman to make short moves, known to the superior officers of the company, will relieve the engineer from contributory negligence in following the custom in violation of the rule of the company. Barry v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 98 Mo. 62.

Knowledge by the superiors of a usage to violate a rule need not be shown by direct evidence, if the practice has been so general that they must have known of it. Ibid.

But the employés cannot by their own disregard of a rule bring about its abrogation without the master's concurrence.

Evidence that employés violated a rule at will is not sufficient to show that it was abrogated, if the 24 L. R. A. company was all the time trying to enforce it. Francis v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. R. R. Co. 110 Mo. 367.

The mere fact that the master must have known that many of its employés went between moving cars in violation of its rules will not relieve them of the charge of negligence in so doing. Wilson v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 94 Mich. 20.

Violation of rules by employés without acquiescence of company is no defense. Sloan v. Georgia Pac. R. Co. 86 Ga. 15.

The mere usage or custom of the employés to disregard a rule is not sufficient to relieve one from the charge of negligence in case he is injured while violating it. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Graham, 24 Ala. 545.

The orders of a proper superior take precedence of the printed rules. Pennsylvania Co. v. Roney, 89 Ind. 453, 46 Am. Rep. 173.

But a special order will supersede a standing rule only where they in terms conflict, or where it is, or ought to be, foreseen when given that the execution of the one is incompatible with the other, or becomes so afterwards by some action of the giver. Where incompatibility arises only upon unforeseen events, the special order must yield. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Meer, 31 Ill. App. 126, 26 Ill. App. 354.

Acquiescence by the division superintendent in the habitual violation of the rule may prevent the master from taking advantage of the fact of its violation, although the injured employé had signed a paper stating that the violation of rules should be at his risk. Northern Pac. Richmond & D. R. Co. 59 Fed. Rep. 419.

The command of the conductor of a freight train to a brakeman to go between the cars when he cannot couple them otherwise is a waiver of the rule of the company prohibiting a brakeman to go between cars under any circumstances. Mason v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 18 L. R. A. 45, 111 N. C. 432.

have been the third,—that contributory negligence was no defense. This same question is raised by instructions given by the court. The determination of this question involves a construction of section 1288 of the Code, which provides that "every corporation constructing or operating a railway shall . . . construct at all points where such railway crosses any public highway good, sufficient, and safe crossings and cattle guards. . . . And any railway company neglecting and refusing to comply with the provisions of this section shall be liable for all damages sustained by reason of such neglect and refusal, and in order for the injured party to recover it shall only be necessary for him to prove such neglect or refusal."

It is contended by appellant that the effect of the provisions at the close of the section quoted is to relieve the plaintiff from proving his own freedom from contributory negligence in order to recover, but the defendant still has thereunder the right to make any defense it may have, including the contributory negligence of plaintiff, while appellee claims that no contributory negligence of the intestate will affect plaintiff's right to recover. Assuming now that under the law it was defendant's duty to erect and maintain such a cattle-guard as would be safe for the purposes for which it must be used, situated as it was, does the section quoted eliminate the defense of contributory negligence? Counsel refer to Code, § 1289, providing for fencing railways, and for recovery for livestock injured or killed, and for recovering for damages from fires set by railways. In this section the provision is that the railway company "shall be liable to the owner of any such stock injured or killed by reason of the want of such fence for the value of the property or damages caused, unless the same was occasioned by the willful act of the owner or his agent. And in order to recover, it shall only be necessary for the owner to prove the injury or destruction of his property." Under this provision it has been held that contributory negligence of an injured party was not a defense to an action for a violation of the provisions of the section. Spence v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 25 Iowa, 189; Aylesworth v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 80 Iowa, 459; Inman v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 60 Iowa, 459; West v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 654, 659; and Engle v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 661.

It will be observed that the language of section 1289 is not the same as in 1288. In the former section the company is made liable in terms absolutely unless the injury was the re-

If a conductor, with the knowledge of a division superintendent, orders his men to handle switches in a different manner than that prescribed by the rules of the company, one of the men cannot be held negligent in obeying the orders of the conductor rather than the rule. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Kier, 41 Kan. 661.

But in Russell v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 47 Fed. Rep. 204, it seems to be doubted whether or not a conductor was authorized to rescind a rule made for his guidance and that of the train hands in regard to the manner of coupling cars.

A conductor of a train seems to be regarded as somewhat out of the general rule both as to liability for obeying and for refusing to obey.

If a conductor obeys an order to start his train before the arrival of another which is overdue, in violation of the rules of the company, without protest, he must be held to have assumed the risk of the negligent act. Wescott v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 153 Mass. 400.

But going out on the road without written instructions as required by the rules of the company will not defeat a recovery, if the train despatcher in giving verbal instructions said he could not give written ones because of the absence of a telegraph operator. Smith v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 93 Mo. 359.

The disobedience must be unnecessary.

Disobedience of the rule is not negligence, if the work could not have been done in obedience to it. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Rudd, 88 Va. 648.

If the work is carried on in such a manner as to render the violation of the rule necessary, or if the master suffers or approves of habitual disregard of the rule, its violation will not be contributory negligence. Hayes v. Bush & Denslow Mfg. Co. 41 Hun, 407.

To bind the employé to observe a rule requiring cars to be coupled with a stick, cars which can be so coupled must be furnished. Hissong v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 91 Ala. 514.

So violation of a rule requiring couplings to be made with a stick is not negligence, where the link is missing and it is necessary to supply one before he coupling can be made. Berrigan v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 37 N. Y. S. R. 414.

It is not negligence for an employé to go between cars to couple them, when the deed cannot be otherwise performed. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Graham, 94 Ala. 545.

A rule against running switches will not preclude a recovery for injuries received while attempting to make one, if that was the only practicable way of putting cars on the required switch. Alexander v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 88 Ky. 589.

Disobedience of a rule of the company forbidding engineers to place their engines in charge of other persons will not defeat the action if such action was necessary because of the sickness of the engineer and the action was not the cause but merely the condition of the accident. East Line & R. R. Co. v. Scott, 71 Tex. 708.

The rule must be applicable.

To charge the injured person with negligence for disobedience of rules, they must have been applicable to him. Quick v. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. 130 Ill. 334.

That a fireman obeyed the orders of the conductor without requiring a compliance with the rules which gave him a right to see the telegraphic orders under which the conductor was acting will not bar a recovery. Hass v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (Iowa) Feb. 2, 1894.

A switchman working under an engineer is not guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to make a flying switch, where the rules of the company forbid conductors and engineers from making such switches but the rule is habitually disregarded by those to whom it applies. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Springsteen, 41 Kan. 724.

But in Senior v. Ward, 1 El. & El. 385, 28 L. J. Q. B. 139, 5 Jur. N. S. 172, 7 Week. Rep. 261, it seems to be intimated that an employé is bound to take the precautions required by the rule himself in case he knows it is habitually ignored by the one whose duty it is to observe the rule. In that case the rule had been established as to the examination of the rope that lifted the cage leading into a mine. The workmen knew that the rule was violated, and, sult of the willful act of the owner. The provision of section 1288 is: "Shall be liable for all damages sustained by means of such neglect or refusal, and in order for the injured party to recover it shall only be necessary for him to prove such neglect and refusal. Under section 1288 a liability is fixed, and it provides what the party seeking to recover must prove in the first instance. If in such an action the plaintiff establishes the neglect and refusal of the company to comply with the statute and the fact that he has sustained an injury by reason thereof, he has made a case entitling him to recover, in the absence of evidence offered by the defendant; but it seems to us the language used does not cut off the right of the defendant to establish the fact, as a defense, that the injury was the result of the intestate's contributory negligence, or, in a proper case, of independent negligence on his part, or any other defense it may have. In Sala v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 85 Iowa, 628, this court construed sec. 1, chap. 104, Acts 20th Gen. Assem., which provides "that a bell and a steam whistle shall be placed on each locomotive engine operated on any railway in this state, and said whistle shall be twice sharply sounded at least sixty rods before a highway crossing is reached, and after this sounding of the whistle the bell shall be rung continuously until the crossing is passed. . . . and the company shall also be liable for all damages which shall be sustained by any person by reason of such neglect." It was said that there was a marked difference in the legal effect of this provision and that in section 1289 of the Code. "That statute [providing for blowing the whistle and ringing the bell] imposes a duty upon the corporation, the omission of which is negligence, but, before the person injured can recover, he must show that his negligence did not contribute to the injuries. That was the construction placed upon a statute which required railway companies to erect signs at crossings, and made them liable for damages for injuries sustained by reason of their failure to erect them. Dodge v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 34 Iowa, 279; Payne v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 44 Iowa, 287. See also Reed v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 74 Iowa, 190.

This statute as to blowing the whistle and ringing the bell is substantially like the provision in section 1288, except that in 1288 these words are added: "And in order for the injured party to recover it shall only be necessary for him to prove such neglect or refusal," and this has the effect of casting the burden of proving contributory negligence on the defendant.

without making the examination themselves they were injured by reason of a defect, and the court held there could be no recovery.

The disobedience must contribute to the injury.

Disobedience of the rule will not bar a recovery, if it did not contribute to the injury. Horan v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. (Iowa) Oct. 14, 1898.

The disregard of the rule will not bar recovery, if its obedience would not have prevented the accident. Reed v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 72 Iowa, 166.

Acting in direct violation of rules will not preclude recovery, unless the accident was due in whole or in part to such violation. Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co. 110 Mass. 240, 14 Am. Rep. 598.

Disobedience will not prevent recovery if obedience would not have removed the danger or prevented the accident. Bonner v. Bean, 80 Tex. 152.

Recovery cannot be prevented if an observance of the rule would not have prevented the accident. Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Wynne (Tex.) March 7, 1898.

Violation of rule will not defeat recovery, if it had nothing to do with the injury. Central R. Co. v. Mitchell, 68 Ga. 178.

Willful injury.

So a recovery may be had if, knowing of the peril of the one injured by reason of his violation of the rule, there is a failure of ordinary care to avoid injury to him. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Watson, 90 Ala. 68; Hiesong v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 91 Ala. 514.

Reasonableness of rule.

Some courts have stated a further exception to the rule to the effect that the rule of the master must have been reasonable. International & G. N. R. Co. Receivers v. Moore (Tex.) May 10, 1898.

But it has elsewhere been said that the judgment of the employe cannot be substituted for the rule. Deeds v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 74 Iowa, 154.

And that if one enters employment with knowledge of the rules, he must be held to have undertaken to acquiesce in them, and he cannot afterwards insist upon the right to have the jury pass on the question of their reasonableness. Wolsey v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 83 Ohio St. 227.

But the law and not the rules of the company defines negligence. Pennsylvania Co. v. Stoelke, 104 Ill. 201.

How the rules are construed.

The rules ought to be construed more strictly against the one who prepared and adopted them than against one who merely assented to be bound by them. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Mitchell (Ga.) May 15, 1893.

So a rule requiring a train to be run very cautiously is met if there is reasonable precaution under the circumstances. Scagel v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 83 Iowa, 380.

Evidence.

The rules of the company are admissible in evidence against an employe. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Askew, 90 Ala. 5.

Although it is not shown that the employe had notice of them. Alcorn v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (Mo.) May 11, 1891.

The injured servant is left to show want of notice to overcome the effect of the rule, which makes these cases in line with those cited above to the effect that knowledge of the rule would be presumed.

Question for court or jury.

Disobedience of a rule is now regarded as very strong evidence of negligence, being sufficient to take the case from the jury.

Violation of rule not to attempt to uncouple cars while in motion is negligence as matter of law. Sedgwick v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 76 Iowa, 341.

Disobedience of a rule is ground for compulsory non-suit. Lockwood v. Chicago & N. R. Co. 53 Wis. 50.

If violation of rules appears in plaintiff's evidence a non-suit should be granted. Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Folks, 76 Ga. 527.

But the question becomes one for the jury when there is a conflict of evidence as to whether the injured person had knowledge of the rules. Seems v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 487; Brunswick & W. R. Co. v. Clem, 80 Ga. 540. H. P. F.

In Manwell v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co., 80 Iowa, 664, the action was to recover for injuries to stock, caused by leaving gates open on the railroad right of way, under section 1289 of the Code, and in construing the same the court said: "The statute provides that, in order to recover, it shall only be necessary for the owner to prove the injury or destruction of his property; but it is manifest that, in order to recover, the owner must prove other facts. The provision quoted was designed to change the burden of proof, to some extent, and thus enable the owner to make a prima facie case by proving fewer facts than would be required in the absence of the statute." We think the provision in section 1289 providing for recovery unless the stock was killed by reason of the willful act of the owner, distinguishes that section, in legal effect, from the provisions of the one in the case at bar, in so far as the defense of contributory negligence is concerned, and that such negligence is a defense under section 1288 in this case. It is true that some language is used in other cases which tends to an opposite conclusion. Thus, in Payne v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 44 Iowa, 236, it is said, in effect, that by section 1288 the liability was absolute, regardless of the question of contributory negligence; but this can hardly be treated as binding as a precedent, as in the decision of the case it was not necessary to construe this section, as the case arose prior to its enactment. In McKeloy v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co., 84 Iowa, 458, the court, in speaking of contributory negligence, said: "It is not our purpose to hold that proof of such negligence would excuse the defendant company from liability, for the language of section 1288 seems to exclude such a rule." That question, however, was not passed upon in the case, the decision resting on the fact that, in any event, independent negligence of the deceased would be available as a defense to the defendant. This precise question was presented in Moriarty v. Central Iowa R. Co. 84 Iowa, 700, but was not decided. Lang v. Holiday Creek R. & Coal Min. Co. 49 Iowa, 469, was a case under section 1288, wherein the company had failed to put up a sign-board as therein provided. It was claimed that the defendant was liable, regardless of the negligence of intestate. The court held that the accident did not result from the failure to erect the sign. It seems to us clear that section 1288 of the Code imposes certain duties on railroad companies; for a failure to perform them, resulting in damages, an action lies; and recovery may be had by proving the neglect or refusal, and that the party was injured as a result thereof. When this is done, a prima facie case is made, which, in the absence of testimony by the defendant, the statute provides shall be sufficient to warrant a recovery. The defendant, however, may establish any defense it may have, including the contributory negligence of plaintiff's intestate. The statute provides what it shall be necessary for "him" (the injured party) to prove. It does not directly or by fair implication eliminate any defense which is ordinarily available to the defendant. In this view the court not only erred in rejecting the offered evidence, but also in its instructions, in so far as they are so worded as to permit a recovery regardless of the contributory negligence of plaintiff's intestate.

8. The court below, in substance, instructed the jury that the cattle-guard in question must be good, sufficient, and safe for all the uses and purposes for which defendant was habitually using it at and prior to the time of the accident. These instructions were excepted to, and an exception was taken to the court's refusal to give certain instructions to the jury embodying the thought that it was only incumbent on the defendant to erect and maintain such a cattle-guard as would be sufficient and safe to turn stock. We think the instructions given by the court touching this matter were correct, and those asked were rightly refused. The evidence, without conflict, shows that this cattle-guard was at a point where the defendant's employes were constantly compelled to cross and recross it in switching cars and in making up trains, and, as located with reference to the necessity of the defendant's employes passing over it in the proper discharge of their duties in switching cars, it is aptly called by one of the witnesses a "man trap." It may be conceded that primarily a cattle-guard is for the purpose of turning stock. It may also be conceded that by law defendant was required to erect and maintain a cattle-guard at the point where this one was located. But we cannot believe that the legislature intended that a railroad company might erect and maintain such a cattle-guard at a point where it was by law required so to do, and which would be sufficient to turn stock, and then so locate its switching yards adjacent thereto as to require its employes to constantly cross the cattle-guard without any protection to life or limb. If it be necessary, in the prosecution of defendant's business, to locate its yards so, as in this case, as to virtually embrace a cattle-guard, then it is clear that defendant owes the duty to its employes, whom it requires to constantly cross it in the proper discharge of their duties, to make such guard reasonably safe for all such uses and purposes. That the guard in question was not good, sufficient, or safe as a crossing for employes must be conceded. We are cited to cases where this court has held that a cattle-guard "means such an appliance as will prevent animals from going upon the land adjoining the right of way" (Heskett v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 61 Iowa, 467), and that the obligation to maintain it is founded only on the relation of the company to the public. Peyton v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 70 Iowa, 522. But it must be remembered that the language used in these cases had reference to the case then made before the court. The precise point in issue in this case, as to the necessity for making a cattle-guard reasonably safe for employes who are in the performance of their duty, required to pass over it, has never before been passed upon by this court. Even if it be conceded that to make such a cattle-guard as will be reasonably safe for employes, when situated and required to be used as this one was, would to some extent impair its efficiency as a guard to turn stock (a point we need not determine), still the defendant would not be relieved of its duty to its employes in this respect. In such a case the safety of the traveling public and of the employes should both be considered by the erection and maintenance of such a guard as will best comply with the provisions of the law, having due regard to all the purposes for which it must be used. We may properly say that no switch yard should be so located, if it is practicable to avoid it, as to require employes, in the switching of cars, to cross and recross a cattle guard. Whether the guard in question was good, sufficient, and safe, in view of all the purposes for which it was required to be used, was a question properly submitted to the jury.

4. The witness Mickey was asked about complaints or protests he had made, while in the defendant's employ, touching the defective condition of the cattle-guard for the use of employes in working over it. The questions were objected to as immaterial and irrelevant. The objections were overruled. The issue was as to whether Ford had made complaints, and received promises, upon which he had a right to rely, that the defect would be remedied, and in the faith thereof, he was induced to remain in the defendant's employ. This could not be established by proving promises made to another, who had protested against working on the cattle guard. The objections should have been sustained.

5. We have examined the record with care, and discover no other error. In view of the reversal of the case, it is not proper for us to discuss matters relating to the weight or sufficiency of the testimony.

Reversed.

1. The words "heirs at law" in a benefit certificate made in Massachusetts by inhabitants of that state must be construed in another state as they would be in Massachusetts.
2. A widow is included among the "heirs at law," within the meaning of an insurance certificate payable to the heirs at law of the member, where, under the laws of the state, she would be entitled to a distributive share.

Torrance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In July, 1891, Joseph Mullen, domiciled in the town of Stafford, in this state, died intestate, leaving the plaintiff, as his widow, and one minor child. The plaintiff and the deceased intermarried prior to 1877, and said child is the issue of the marriage. At the time of his death, Joseph Mullen was a member of the Bay State Beneficiary Association, of Westfield, Mass., — a corporation organized under the laws of that state "for the purpose of providing benefit and protection to its members and their families." He became a member thereof in 1882, while domiciled in the state of Massachusetts, where he and his family continued to reside for some years afterwards. By the certificate of membership issued to him by said association, he was constituted a member thereof; and in said certificate the association agreed "to pay to the 'heirs at law' of said member, in sixty days after due proof of the death of said member, a sum equal to the amount received from one death assessment, but not to exceed five thousand dollars." Within sixty days after his death, said association paid to the defendant, Reed, as the guardian of said minor child, the sum of $5,000, in full of the amount due under said certificate, and he now holds the same as such guardian. The present action was brought by the plaintiff, the widow of Joseph Mullen, against said guardian, to recover a portion of said insurance money. The defendant, Reed, demurred to the complaint because it did not appear therein "that the plaintiff is an heir at law of the said Joseph Mullen, or that she is entitled to any part of said insurance money." The court overruled the demurrer, and subsequently, after the administrator of Joseph Mullen had been cited in as a party, and "after a full hearing," no answer having been filed in the case, rendered judgment that the widow recover of the defendant, Reed, one third of the insurance money, together with costs of suit. From that judgment, Reed, as guardian of the child, took the present appeal; alleging, as reasons of appeal that the court erred in overruling the demurrer, and in deciding that the plaintiff was entitled to one third of the money. It does not appear that the administrator makes any claim to the insurance money, or any part thereof, or that he took any part in this suit. There is really but one question before us upon this appeal, and that is whether the widow is entitled to one third of the insurance money.

By a written agreement signed by the counsel for both parties, filed in the court below after the present appeal was taken, and printed with the record, the plaintiff attempts to bring up the question whether the widow is or is not entitled to one half, rather than one third of the insurance money, if she is entitled to any; but this agreement is no part of the record, in any proper sense, and it nowhere appears upon the record, as required by the Statute (Gen. Stat. § 1195), that this question was raised on the trial below, and decided adversely to the plaintiff. That question is therefore not properly before us, and for this reason we decline to consider it.

The question, then, is whether the widow is entitled to one third of the insurance money; and its solution depends upon the construction of the words "heirs at law," contained in the certificate of membership under which the money was paid over to the guardian of the minor child. What do these words "heirs at law," mean, in this certificate? Do they include or exclude the widow? Under these words the guardian claims the entire sum for the minor child, and the widow claims a share of it under the same words. The question, of course, is, What was intended by these words at the time they were put into this certificate? And this is to be ascertained from the words used to express the intention, when read in the light of all the circumstances under which they were used. In ascertaining their meaning, it must be borne in mind that the contract embodied in the certificate was made in Massachusetts, by parties domiciled or located there; that it was undoubtedly made with reference to the law of that state alone, and that, both by its terms, and by the understanding of the parties, it was to be performed there. This being so the general rule is that it should be construed and interpreted according to the laws of that state. Smith v. Mead, 3 Conn. 253, 8 Am. Dec. 183; Philadelphia Loan Co. v. Towner, 13 Conn. 249; Koster v. Merritt, 32 Conn. 246. "For purposes of construction, it is always legitimate to consider the time when, and the circumstances in which, the will was made, and we think the law under which it was made is one of those circumstances." Stoigg v. Atkinson, 144 Mass. 564. This principle is, we think, equally applicable to an instrument like this certificate. We therefore think the words "heirs at law," in this instrument, ought to be construed by us as they would be by the courts of Massachusetts, if this certificate was before them for construction upon this point; and, as we understand the matter, the courts of that state, in cases where the words "heir at law" are used in an instrument disposing of personal property alone, having quite uniformly construed them as meaning those persons who are entitled to take under the statute of distributions, unless there is something in the context to indicate a contrary contention. Houghton v. Kendall, 7 Allen, 72; Sweet v. Dutton, 109 Mass. 589; White v. Stanfield, 146 Mass. 424, 12 Am. Rep. 744; Kendall v. Gleason, 152 Mass. 457, 9 L. R. A. 609. And not only this, but the courts of that state have held that the words "heirs at law," when used in such an instrument, indicated an intent that such persons are to take in the same manner, and in the same proportions, as if the property had come to them as intestate estate, unless a contrary intention appears. Thus, in Houghton v. Kendall, supra, the court says: "In this commonwealth, we find no authority which would conflict with the adoption of the construction which seems to us reasonable,—that, when the word 'heirs' is used in the gift of personality, it should primarily be held to refer to those who would be entitled to take under the statute of distributions, and to indicate that they should take in the same manner and in the same proportions as if it had come to them as intestate estate of the person whose heirs they are called." See also Bassett v. Granger, 100 Mass. 348; Rand v. Sanger, 115 Mass. 124. The rules of construction thus applied in that state, in the cases cited, do not probably differ materially, if at all, from those that would be applied under similar circumstances by the courts of this state. In both, the principal object is to ascertain the intention of the parties from the words used to express it; in both, the word "heirs" will be given its strict, primary, technical meaning, if such appears to have been the intention of the parties; and in both it will be given its more comprehensive and popular meaning if it appears to have been used in that sense. Sweet v. Dutton, supra; Leake v. Watson, 60 Conn. 498–506. Under the laws of Massachusetts at the time when this certificate was issued, if an intestate left a widow and issue, the widow was entitled to one third of the residue of the personal property; if he left a widow and no issue, the widow took the whole residue of personality, to the amount of $5,000, and one half of the excess of the residue of such property, above $10,000, Mass. Pub. Stat. 1882, p. 770, chap. 185, § 3. If then this certificate is to be construed as the courts of Massachusetts would probably construe it,—and we think it should be,—it follows that the words "heirs at law" must be held to include the widow, and that she is entitled to one third of the insurance money, under the certificate, because that is the share of this money she would take under the laws of that state.

The result thus reached is also, we think, in accordance with the actual intent of Joseph Mullen, so far as the same can be ascertained from the certificate, read in the light of the circumstances under which it was made, as they appear of record, and without reference to the rule we have been considering. The certificate is in the nature of a contract of insurance. The money to become due on it, under the laws of Massachusetts (Supp. Pub. Stat. p. 811, § 15), as appears of record, could not be taken by creditors, and it is fair to presume that this was known to the deceased at the time the certificate was issued. If so, there would be the further presumption that he thus intended to create a fund for the benefit of his family, primarily, and not for the benefit of his creditors, or his estate; a fund that would go to the members of that family living at the time of his death, not as a part of his estate, but directly by force of the certificate. He designated the class who were to take as beneficiaries by the words "heirs at law;" and it is a fair presumption that he used those words for this purpose, in view of the uniform meaning which had been given to them, in instruments of a nature similar to this certificate, by the courts of Massachusetts. In short, from the certificate itself, read in the light of the circumstances under which it was made, we think it is fair to conclude that Joseph Mullen used the words "heirs at law" in their popular sense as meaning those persons who would take his intestate personal property under the statute of distributions of the state of Massachusetts, and that under them, consequently, he meant to include his widow, the money due upon the certificate at the time of his death formed no part of his estate, but belonged to the beneficiaries. It nowhere appears that the deceased had the power to substitute other beneficiaries in place of the class first designated; and, if he had, it is quite certain that he never exercised it. This certificate, then, was in effect a valid agreement, on the part of the association, to pay the money to become due under its provisions to the beneficiaries designated therein. When due, the money certainly belonged to them, and not to the estate of the deceased. Continental Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 34 Conn. 305; Continental L. Ins. Co. v. Palmer, 42 Conn. 60, 19 Am. Rep. 580; Northwestern Masonic Aid Assn. v. Jones, 154 Pa. 99.

James CAMPBELL'S APPEAL from Probate.

(....Conn. ....)

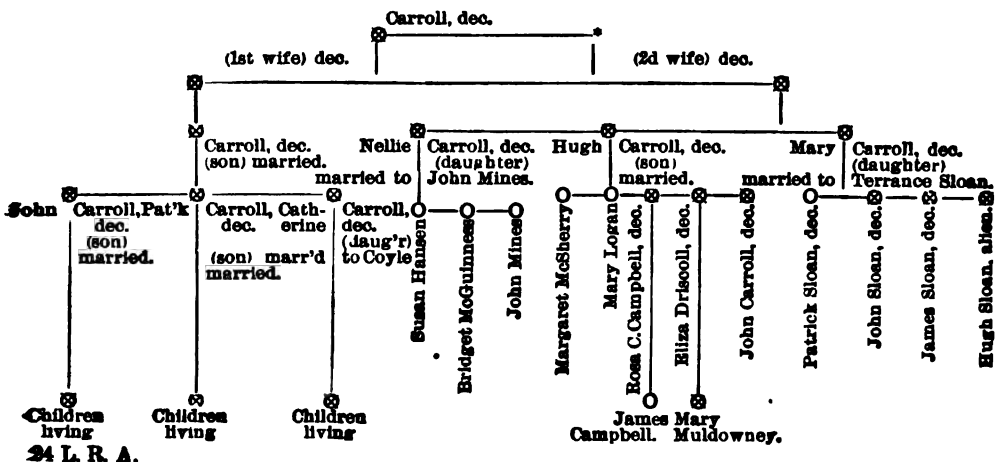

1. The common-law rule of the exclusion from inheritance of all tracing their descent through uninheritable blood was never in force in Connecticut, and therefore inheritance may be derived by collateral relatives through alien ancestors.
2. The child of a cousin cannot take the parent's share, under the Connecticut statute of distributions, where the parent dies before the intestate.
3. An allegation by an appellant that he is "aggrieved both as an heir-at-law and next of kin" is a mere averment of a legal conclusion and not sufficient to show a right to appeal, where the facts set up show that his claim is without foundation.

APPPEAL by James Campbell from a judgment of the Superior Court for Fairfield County erasing from the docket his appeal from a decree of the Probate Court ordering distribution of the estate of Patrick Sloan, deceased. Affirmed.

On January 25, 1893, Patrick Sloan died at Bridgeport, intestate possessed of $5,000 in personal property and $36,000 in real estate. He was a naturalized citizen of this country. He left no lineal descendants, nor wife, sisters, father, mother, uncles, nor aunts, and but one brother, who was an alien. He left five first cousins, Margaret McSherry, Bridget McGuinness, Mary Logan, Susan Hanson, and John Mines, and a number of children of first cousins, among whom was the appellant. The first cousins above named were naturalized citizens of this country. The probate court found that the alien brother was entitled to all of the personal estate, and that the first cousins were entitled to share equally all of the real estate. The relationship of the parties is shown by the following chart:

NOTE.—As to how far the common law has been adopted in this country, see note to McKennon v. Winn (Okla.) 22 L. R. A. 501.

The parties particularly interested in this proceeding, together with the decedent, being represented by O, and the others by S. The claim of the appellant was that according to the principle of the common law, the blood of an alien ancestor would impede the descent of the title to land, when title was required to be traced through such alien. That this principle was a part of the laws of Connecticut; that the English Act of 11 & 12 Wm. III., which removed this disability in favor of natural born subjects of the realm also became the law in Connecticut; that the disability was never removed in favor of naturalized citizens who if compelled to trace their connection with the decedent through alien blood were disabled from taking, whereas the appellant, who was a natural born citizen, was relieved from the disability caused by the alien blood of his ancestors, and therefore, together with the other natural born children of decedent's cousins was entitled to the real estate.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Canfield & Judson, for appellees:

This court has always required an interest on the part of an appellant of a far different quality than that set out in the appellant's motion to the probate court, as the second reason of his appeal.

For a period of two hundred and fifty years, intestate estates in Connecticut have been distributed by force of our own laws concerning the distribution of intestate estates, and the English common law on the subject of descent of land within the colony, was never recognized in any of its peculiar phases.

Long and uninterrupted usage, common understanding and general acquiescence, have made it the true construction.

Flynn v. Morgan, 55 Conn. 148; State v. Jerome, 33 Conn. 268.

In 1725, John Winthrop, of New London, as administrator of his father's intestate estate, refused to make any inventory of the real estate, claiming that as the only son of the intestate, he was by virtue of the laws of England pertaining thereto, entitled to all of the real estate to the exclusion of his sister Anne, wife of Thomas Lechmere, and vigorously claimed that "the laws of the colony which they are empowered to make are to be wholesome and reasonable and not contrary to the laws of England."

This attempt at interpolating conditions into the statute of distributions of the colony did not in the courts meet with success and it was adjudged that his sister was entitled to one-third part of all the real estate of which their father died possessed.

From the judgment rendered by the superior court and the proceedings of the general assembly, Winthrop appealed to the king for relief and the case having been heard by the lord justices, the statute of distribution in force in the colony was declared to be void, as contrary to the English laws of descent.

Winthrop v. Lechmere, 7 Conn. Colonial Records, 191, 571-579.

The general assembly of the colony, when they received the news of this decision at the July session, 1723, made a vigorous protest and complained of the fact that they had not been given an opportunity to defend the validity of the laws of the colony pertaining to the distribution of intestate estates.

The resentment felt by the colony, and growing out of the decision in Winthrop's Case, evidently had effect, for estates were continued to be settled under our own statutes as before, and later in the case of Clark v. Towsey, which went before the Lords Justices in England, on appeal from a judgment rendered by the superior court sitting at New Haven, March 6, 1732, and involved precisely the same question, as to whether intestate estates within the colony of Connecticut were to be settled and distributed, having reference to the laws of England, it was decided that our statute of distributions was effective and the appeal was dismissed.

Clark v. Towsey, 9 Conn. Colonial Records, p. 550.

It will thus be seen that from the beginning of the colony we refused to permit the doctrines of the common law to govern our own rules of descent, and in much stronger language can the assertion be made, that no such obsolete principle for which the appellant contends, will ever be allowed by our courts to be interpolated into our statute of distributions.

It was the fiction of the common law that the title traversed through all the intermediate ancestors who intervened between the intestate and the claimant, and for reasons of feudal origin, the title, in its descent, was obstructed by meeting with alien blood.

Such is not the theory of descents in this state or in any other state except where the common law of England has been adopted in toto by statute.

Blackstone says: "The whole of the supposed descent from indefinite ancestors is but fictitious, the law may as well suppose the requisite ancestor as to suppose the required descent."

Also see remarks of Mr. Senator Tracey in Jackson v. Fitz Simmons, 10 Wend. 20, 24 Am. Dec. 198.

It is said in Swift's Digest, vol. 1, p. 157: "Lands escheat to the state on failure of heirs according to the rules of descent."

In view of an unbroken line of decisions in this state, to the effect that estates here are not affected by the common-law canons of descent as they existed in England it seems absurd for the appellant to set up the claim which he here makes.

Brown v. Dye, 2 Root, 280; Fitch v. Brainard, 2 Day, 189. See also Strong's Case, Kirby, 345; Canaan v. Salisbury, 1 Root, 155; New Haven v. Newton, 12 Conn. 175; Hillhouse v. Chester, 3 Day, 218, 3 Am. Dec. 265; Heath v. White, 5 Conn. 233; State v. Danforth, 8 Conn. 118; Baldwin v. Walker, 21

Conn. 180; Dickinson's App. 42 Conn. 502, 19 Am. Rep. 533.

Even were the appellant to demonstrate that the common-law disability referred to, became a part of our laws of descent, he will have gained nothing by the demonstration; for the bar was removed in respect to native-born subjects of the realm, by the Act of 11 & 12 Wm. III.

Acts of parliament in amelioration of the common law passed prior to 1766, while having no force as statutes or positive rules of law, had their effect in determining the decision of the court if applicable to our conditions.

State v. Ward, 43 Conn. 492, 21 Am. Rep. 665; McCreery v. Somerville, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 354, 6 L. ed. 109; Palmer v. Downer, 2 Mass. 179, note; Haigh v. Haigh, 9 R. L. 30.

If effect, then, is given to the act of William III., whereby the descent would be no longer impeded in case of a native-born citizen, the same condition of amelioration of the hardship of the common law must, under the mandates of the Constitution of the United States, be fully accorded to naturalized citizens, and upon this line of reasoning, the appellees still remain the rightful heirs at law of the intestate in respect to the real estate in controversy.

Naturalization gives an alien all the rights of a natural born citizen; he thereby becomes capable of receiving property by descent and of transmitting it in the same way.

Jackson v. Green, 7 Wend. 833; Luhre v. Bimer, 80 N. Y. 172.

In adopting the common law it must be applicable to the habits and conditions of our society and in harmony with the genius, spirit, and objects of our institutions.

Seely v. Peters, 10 Ill. 180; Wagner v. Bisell, 3 Iowa, 401.

Naturalization by act of parliament clothed a person with all the rights of a native born even in the time of the fullest rigor of the common law.

Mr. George G. Sill for appellee Susan Hansen.

Baldwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant claims to be aggrieved by the probate decree of distribution, as an heir-at-law and next of kin to the intestate, and also as a citizen of the state, acting for himself and all the rest of its citizens. His contention is that either the real estate in question escheated to the state, in which case he, as one of its citizens, has an interest in defeating a distribution to private individuals, or else that an escheat, so far as he is concerned, has been prevented by force of the Statute of 11 & 12 Wm. III.; chap. 6, in favor of inheritances by natural-born citizens.

It was a rule of the common law of England that, "on failure of lineal descendants or issue of the person last seized, the inheritance shall descend to his collateral relations, being blood of the first purchaser." 2 Bl. Com. 320. The 34 L. R. A.

requirement that the heir must be of the blood—that is, descended from the first purchaser—was something peculiar to the feudal system. It rested on the principle that feuds were granted for personal service and personal merit, and that like service and like merit on the part of the successors in estate of the feudatory would be best assured by admitting to that number only those who derived their natural characteristics from him by descent. A legal fiction was next invented by which, failing direct descendants of the person last seized, his collateral heirs were deemed to be of the blood of the first purchaser; that position being arbitrarily assigned to the common ancestor, whether in fact he ever owned the land or not. In order to establish their title, however, it was necessary to trace their descent back to him, in each degree, through "inheritable blood." If, therefore, any intermediate ancestor was an alien, as he could have no heirs, so he could have no inheritable blood, and the land escheated. It is this regard paid by the common law to the original purchaser of the estate, real or fictitious, that led it to reckon degrees of consanguinity in accordance with the canon law, by simply going back to the common ancestor, without then proceeding, as by the civil law, to compute the degrees between him and the intestate. The real-estate tenures of a country are necessarily an important feature of its political system. The institutions of feudalism and primogeniture were obviously unsuited to the conditions under which New England was first settled, and her people looked more to the civil than to the common law to guide their policy as to the distribution of landed estates. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 404, 408. In October, 1639, the general court of Connecticut, upon the report of a committee which had been appointed "to ripen some orders that were left unfinished by the former court," as to the "settling of lands, testaments of the deceased," and other matters, enacted that intestate estates should be divided by the public (or particular) court between the wife, children, or kindred, "as in equity they shall see meet;" and, if no kindred be found, the court "to administer for the public good of the commonwealth." 1 Conn. Colonial Records, 88; Ludlow's Code, 553.

In the Revision of 1673 (ed. 1865, p. 86), the provision is that such estates be divided between the wife and children or kindred "according to law, and for want of law, according to rules of righteousness and equity; and if no kindred be found, the court to administer for the public good of the colony." At the close of the century, in 1689, a statute of distributions was passed, copied mainly from that adopted several years before in Massachusetts. It put all the children of an intestate on a footing of equality, except that the eldest son was to have a double portion. Statutes, Revision of 1702, ed. 1715, p. 61. In 1718 it was further provided that male heirs should have their shares set out in real estate, so far as this was practicable. Id. p. 192. In 1727 (Sess. Laws, p. 110), it was enacted that real estate which came to the intestate by descent should be distributed among his kindred of the blood of the purchasing ancestor, without distinction between those of the whole blood and those of the half blood, nor should any such distinction be made as to real estate which came to the intestate by purchase, and also that "the next degree of kindred in the line transverse shall be admitted to the inheritance before the next degree of kindred in the line ascendant; and the next degree of kindred in the line ascendant shall be admitted to the inheritance before a remoter degree in the line transverse." This statute was omitted in the Revision of 1750. This course of legislation plainly set up for the colony of Connecticut rules of inheritance differing fundamentally from those of the common law of England. For that cause, our statute of distribution was pronounced null and void by the king, in council, in the well-known case of Winthrop v. Lechmere, in 1727-28. 7 Conn. Colonial Records, 191, 571-579. That judgment was, however, practically disregarded in the colony; and the statute was finally sustained, as a legitimate exercise of chartered rights, by the same tribunal, in 1745, in the case of Clark v. Towsey, 9 Conn. Colonial Records, 587-593. This had been the uniform doctrine of our own courts. "The English law of descents has never been admitted in this state." Heath v. White, 5 Conn. 228, 233. The common-law maxim, "Seisina facit stipitem," was never accepted here. Hillhouse v. Chester, 8 Day, 166, 211, 8 Am. Dec. 285; Bush v. Bradley, 4 Day, 298, 305. The computation of degrees of relationship between an intestate and his heirs has always been made according to the rule of the civil law. Hillhouse v. Chester, supra. Bastards have been allowed to inherit through their mothers without regard to the common-law doctrine as to their defect of "inheritable blood." Brown v. Dye, 2 Root, 280; Heath v. White, supra; Dickinson's App. 42 Conn. 491, 19 Am. Rep. 533.

The only indication, either in our legislative or judicial records, of the recognition in this colony of the common-law doctrine that no title to an inheritance could be traced through alien blood, which has been brought to our attention by the researches of counsel, is that contained in a private act passed by the general assembly in 1774. By this statute, entitled "An act for the naturalization of Francis Forgue, for confirming the purchase of real estate by him made and rendering his issue capable of inheriting," a grant of naturalization was made to Francis Forgue, a Frenchman, who had purchased lands in the colony, and resided in Fairfield. His title to these lands was confirmed, and it was declared that his son, Francis Forgue, Jr., was, and should be "capable of inheriting and taking by descent or purchase all and any real estate or estates whatsoever as he might, could, or would have been, had the said Francis, the elder, been completely naturalized as aforesaid before the birth of the said Francis, the younger." 14 Conn. Colonial Records, 308, 309. It is doubtless true that this express provision in favor of the son was made in order to assure or confirm his title, should he survive his father, and become his heir, to the lands acquired by the latter while still a subject of France, as well as to any which he might subsequently purchase; and it is probable that it was inserted in view of the rule of common law that naturalization by act of parliament enables the son of the alien so naturalized to inherit from him, though born before the passage of the act. Such was not the case, if the alien had only been made a denizen by letters patent from the crown (Co. Litt. 129); and the draughtsman of our statute could hardly have felt safe in assuming that greater effect, even in our own courts, would be given to a colonial than to a royal grant, unless it was plainly required in express terms. So late as 1795, it was an unsettled question in this state whether a conveyance of land to an alien might not be an absolute nullity. 1 Swift, Syst. Laws Conn. 166; Stat. (ed. 1784), p. 83; Sess. Laws 1777, p. 476.

It is therefore our opinion that the common-law rule of the exclusion from inheritance of all tracing their descent through uninheritable blood was never in force in Connecticut, and that there was no error in the decree of distribution to the first cousins of Patrick Sloan, notwithstanding their relationship to him through alien ancestors.

Another first cousin was the mother of the appellant; but as she died before the intestate, and there is no representation among cousins under our statute of distribution, the appellant had no right to share in the inheritance, as one of the next of kin. Nor has the state (if he could make claim in its behalf) any interest in the lands, since there has been no escheat.

The extent of whatever interest the appellant could claim in the estate appeared on the face of his appeal to the superior court. He could appeal only if "aggrieved" by the decree; and as he was neither next of kin, nor heir-at-law, nor representative of any party in interest, the cause was properly erased from the docket. His allegation that he is "aggrieved both as an heir-at-law and next of kin" is a mere averment of a legal conclusion from the facts previously set up, and these show that it is wholly without foundation. The appellant claims that as, if his mother had been first purchaser of the land in controversy, he could have claimed it as ancestral estate, under Gen. Stat., § 632, the motion to erase should have been denied. But, had he such a claim to make, he was bound to set out the facts upon which it arose. In the absence of such allegations, and in the face of others showing that he is not the next of kin, the bare statement that he is the heir-at-law could not avail to defeat the motion to erase. Norton's App. 46 Conn. 527.

There is no error in the judgment appealed from.

The other Judges concurred.

Mattie M. TATE, Appt.,

City of GREENSBORO et al.

(..... N. C. ....)

1. The destruction of shade trees standing on the outer edge of the sidewalk in front of a residence because the municipal authorities regard them as an obstruction of the walk and injurious to health, does not render the city or its authorized agents liable for damages to the abutting proprietor.
2. The power of a city in respect to trees in streets can be delegated to a city committee composed of members of the board of aldermen.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Guilford County in favor of defendants in a proceeding to recover damages for the alleged wrongful removal of trees standing on the outer edge of the sidewalk in front of plaintiff's residence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dillard &amp; King, for appellees:

The city of Greensboro is a creature of the law with the capacities and powers named in its charter and such others by implication as are material and necessary for the object and purposes of its incorporation.

Charter, § 60.

It could acquire and have streets by condemnation proceedings as prescribed in the charter, by a twenty years' user, by dedication of the private owner, and acceptance by the city, and by acts and conduct on the part of the owner amounting to an estoppel in pais.Charter, § 60; State v. McDaniel, 53 N. C. 284; State v. Purify, 86 N. C. 681; Boyd v. Achenbach, 79 N. C. 539.

The city had power to abate a nuisance from whatever cause arising.

Charter, § 65.

Having accepted and taken possession and control of the sidewalk for public use, the city, although owning but an easement, had the right by its officers to decide and pass upon the question as to whether the trees were, or were not, an inconvenience or obstruction, and as to how much of the way should be improved, and how improved, and to such right of the city, all other rights of abutting owners must be, and are subordinated, and no judicial review can be had of the city's discretion.

Elliott, Roads & Streets, § 848; Wood, Nuisance, §§ 237, 252.Had the city passed a resolution by its board of aldermen directing the trees to be taken up, their removal would have been as to this plaintiff damnum absque injuria, and although no such previous order of the board was passed, yet, it being within the scope of its authority to remove them, in the exercise of its discretion, if the city with the co-defendants, its agents, committed the act complained of as alleged in the complaint, and the city avowed the act and ratified it and assumed to defend it and its consequences, it is the same thing, in legal effect, as if the cutting of the trees had been previously passed upon, and ordered by an order of the board in regular session, and no action can be maintained therefor.Ratihabito mandato, equiparatur.Elliott, Roads & Streets, § 857; 1 Dill. If the removal of the trees was unlawful, as taking another's property, then as the city determined to remove them and did remove them, if a remedy for payment of damages was provided by the charter, as was the fact in the city's charter, that remedy must be pursued, and the common-law remedy is excluded.

Mr. James E. Boyd also for appellees.

Burwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended by the plaintiff, first, that, even admitting that the act of which she complains (the destruction of shade trees standing on the outer edge of the sidewalk in front of her residence, in the city of Greensboro) was done by the duly authorized agents of that municipal corporation, she is still entitled to recover for the damage done to her property by the cutting down of these trees, because his honor has found that they did not obstruct the passage of persons on the sidewalk, that the public convenience did not require their destruction, and that the mudhole in the street, for the removing of which this act seems to have been done, could have been remedied without cutting them down. This phase of the case presents for our consideration this question: Can the courts review the exercise by the city of Greensboro of its power to repair and improve its streets, and remove what it considers obstructions therein, and find and declare that certain trees in the streets of that city, which the municipal authorities honestly believed were injurious and obstructive to the public, were in fact not so, and upon such findings, there being no allegation of negligence or of any want of good faith on the part of the city, award damages to an abutting proprietor, the comfort of whose home has been lessened by the removal of the trees?

The street in which these trees stood was dedicated to public use as a street by those under whom the plaintiff claims title. Holding control of this street by reason of its dedication only, the city nevertheless has exactly the same rights therein, and responsibilities therefor, as if it had been, by deed of the owner, conveyed to the corporation for use for street purposes, or had been condemned and taken for those purposes according to the provisions of the charter; and the rights of the plaintiff therein are no greater than if it had been so conveyed, or so condemned and taken. Now, the responsibilities that counties and townships assume, or are put under by the law, in relation to their highways, is very different from those of cities and towns in relation to their streets. It is required that roads shall be kept in repair, and certain individuals upon whom is cast, in one way or another, the burden of seeing that these repairs are made, can be indicted for failing to perform this duty; but the municipality (county or township) is not held liable for damages that may result from the road's being out of order, or obstructed. Cities and towns, however, are held to strict pecuniary accountability for the condition of their streets. They are not political divisions of the state, made by it for convenience in its government of the whole, but are corporations chartered, presumably, at the request of the inhabitants, and granted privileges, and charged with corresponding responsibilities. Among the very gravest of the pecuniary responsibilities that the law imposes on cities and towns is liability for damages to persons and property, caused by a defective or improperly obstructed street. Bunch v. Edenton, 90 N. C. 431; White v. Chowan Comrs. Id. 437, 47 Am. Rep. 584. Hence it is that the law gives to all such corporations an almost absolute discretion in the maintenance of their streets; considering, it seems, as is most reasonable, that wide discretion as to the manner of performance should be conferred where responsibility for improper performance is so heavily laid. An illustration of this is the provision of the Code (sec. 3403) that the commissioners of towns "shall provide for keeping in proper repair the streets and bridges of the town in the manner and to the extent they may deem best." We think that under its charter, and under the general law of the state (2 Code, chap. 69), the city of Greensboro was clothed with such discretion in the control and improvement of its streets; and if damage come to the plaintiff by reason of acts done by it, neither negligently nor maliciously and wantonly, but in good faith, in the careful exercise of that discretion, it is damnum absque injuria. Smith v. Washington, 61 U. S. 20 How. 135, 15 L. ed. 853; Brush v. Carbondale, 78 Ill. 74; Pontiac v. Carter, 32 Mich. 164.

It is not to be denied that the abutting proprietor has rights as an individual in the street in his front, as contradistinguished from his rights therein as a member of the corporation, or one of the public. The trees standing in the street along the sidewalk are, in a restricted sense, his trees. If they are cut or injured by an individual who has no authority from the city to cut or remove them, he may recover damages of such individual. His property in them is such that the law will protect it from the act of such a wrongdoer and trespasser. Bliss v. Ball, 99 Mass. 597, and Graves v. Shattuck, 85 N. H. 257, 69 Am. Dec. 536, are illustrations of this principle. In the former case, the court, speaking of the injury done by defendant to the trees in the street in front of plaintiff's lot, said: "If the defendant thought they were a nuisance, he might have complained to the selectmen, and it was for them to decide the question whether they should be removed. . . . The defendant had no authority to remove them, nor were the jury authorized to decide the question whether they ought to remain." And thus that authority seems abundantly to sustain the position that it is not for a court and jury to review the conduct of the proper municipal authorities in such a matter as that now under consideration. In Barnes v. District of Columbia, 91 U. S. 540, 23 L. ed. 440, it is said: "The authorities state, and our own knowledge is to the effect, that the care and superintendence of streets, alleys, and highways, the regulation of grades, and the opening of new and the closing of old streets, are peculiarly municipal duties. No other power can so wisely and judiciously control this subject as the authority of the immediate locality where the work is to be done."

The wisdom of this rule is well illustrated by this action. Complaints were made, it seems, by citizens, that these trees were injurious to the public way, and in their effects, perhaps, to the public health. The proper authorities of the city, clothed with the power to repair the streets and protect the public health, listened to these complaints, and in the exercise of their best judgment, so far as appears, decided that the interest of the community required their removal. The proposition of the plaintiff is that a jury shall judge of the correctness of this conclusion, and if they find that the officials committed what they think was an error, they and the city shall be mulcted in damages. "The maintenance of such an action would transfer to court and jury the discretion which the law vests in the municipality; but transfer them, not to be exercised directly and finally, but indirectly and partially, by the retroactive effect of punitive verdicts upon special complaints." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 255. Phifer v. Cox, 21 Ohio St. 248, 8 Am. Rep. 58, which plaintiff's counsel cited in their brief, related to a county road, and the alleged wrongful cutting of plaintiff's hedge was done by a private citizen. So it has no application, we think, to this case, and belongs to the same class of decisions as Graves v. Shattuck, and Bliss v. Ball, supra; Bills v. Bicknap, 86 Iowa, 588 (also cited), relates to the cutting down of trees standing in a highway in the country, and the action was to restrain the supervisor of the road. In Eberett v. Council Bluffs, 46 Iowa, 66 (also relied on by plaintiff), which was a suit to enjoin the defendant from cutting down certain shade trees in front of plaintiff's lot, the petition alleged that the trees were "perfectly safe and sound, and afforded no obstruction to the free use of the street and sidewalk," and stated reasons why they should not be removed. The defendant made no answer, and, as the court said, the allegations of the petition were taken as true; and so it appeared, by the admission of the defendant, that its officers were about to do, under its orders, a wrong to the plaintiff, which, because it conceded that the public interest did not in any way require it to be done, would be wanton and unnecessary. We think that case is clearly distinguishable from the one now under consideration. The principles which govern in this matter are well stated in Chase v. Oshkosh, 81 Wis. 318, 15 L. R. A. 553,—an action for damages for cutting down shade trees, very similar to the one we are considering,—from which we make the following quotation: "The right of the public to the use of the street for the purposes of travel extends to the portion set apart and used for sidewalks, as well as to the way for carriages, wagons, etc., and, in short, to the entire width of the street upon which the land of the lot owner abuts. As against the lot owner, the city, as trustee of the public use, has an undoubted right, whenever its authorities see fit, to open, and fit for use and travel, the street over which the public easement extends, to the entire width; and whether it will so open and improve it, or whether it should be opened or improved, is a matter of discretion, to be determined by the public authorities to whom the charge and control of the public interests in and over such easements are committed. With this discretion of the authorities, courts cannot ordinarily interfere, upon the complaint of the lot owner, so long as the easement continues to exist. . . . The public use is the dominant interest, and the public authorities are the exclusive judges when, and to what extent, the streets shall be improved. Courts can interfere only in cases of fraud and oppression, constituting manifest abuse of discretion. It necessarily follows that, for the performance of this discretionary duty by the city officers in a reasonable and prudent manner, no action can be maintained against the city."

Having shown, as we think, that the plaintiff cannot recover of the city, we come to consider her second proposition,—that she can recover damages of "the other defendants, King and Scott, not as the servants or agents of the city, but as independent tortfeasors," as it is stated in the brief of her counsel. In other words, it is proposed that the cause of action, as against the city, shall be abandoned, and the cause proceed against the other defendants, upon the theory that they had no authority from the city to do the act complained of. We think the power given to the city over the streets could be delegated to a street committee composed of members of the board of aldermen, as this one was: that this action was the action of that committee, and therefore of the city; and that just as these individuals would have been answerable in damages to the plaintiffs, if the act had been beyond the power of the municipality, so they are not liable if the act was within those powers. All went to show that the individual defendants were acting as agents and officers of the city. They so assert. The city so insists, and distinctly ratifies their act. Therefore, as the city has done no legal wrong, neither have they.

Affirmed.

Avery, J. dissenting:

It is always safe to recur to fundamental principles. It is perilous to refrain from going to the fountain head, where the controversy arises out of an attempt of a public agency to use or destroy, without compensation, what is claimed to be private property. The very question involved in the case at bar is, What are the rights, respectively, of the servient and dominant owners,—the town and the abutting proprietor in a street,—what passed to the public with the easement, and what residuary interest remained in the owner after the appropriation by the municipality for corporate purposes? The taking of private property for a public highway, like any other exercise of the right of eminent domain, can be justified only on the ground of public necessity,—that it is essential in order to subserve the convenience or promote the prosperity of the great body of people, comprehended under the general designation of the "public," to give them the use of it for certain specified purposes. Cooley, Const. Lim. 643. Where an easement is acquired, whether by grant, dedication, or condemnation, nothing more passes to the public than the power to use the land strictly in furtherance of the objects for which the legislature authorized its appropriation. Except in so far as his right of enjoyment is restricted by the inhibition against his interference with its use for the particular public purposes, all of the rights of ownership are still retained by the holder of the servient tenement. The other estate dominates and overshadows his right only so far as is necessary to subserve the ends for which its privilege has been granted. The residuary rights of the abutting owner in a street are somewhat more restricted than those of an adjacent proprietor in a public road, because, in contemplation of law, the damages for the taking are measured by the extent of the public use, and the consequent limitation of private enjoyment by the servient owner.

I may safely lay it down as a general proposition that, when the legislature permits private property to be taken by a public or quasi public corporation, the state intends that it shall be appropriated only for corporate purposes,—such uses as may be necessary in order to enable the public agency to perform its duties to the state, and enjoy the compensatory privileges granted to it. Whatever rights of property in streets do not pass, from the very nature of a municipality, as necessary to the discharge of its public functions, or as inseparable incidents to the franchise granted, remain in the abutting proprietor, reserved by implication of law for his benefit, whether the city or town has acquired the fee or an easement, either by grant, dedication, or condemnation, and whether the line of such abutting owner extends to the margin or middle of the street. The abutting proprietors have a qualified property in a street, which entitles them to make “any beneficial use of the soil of such highway which is consistent with the prior and paramount rights of the public therein for street purposes proper.” 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 656b. “If they own the fee to the center line of the streets,” says Judge Dillon, “their rights therein are legal in their nature. If they own the fee to the line of the streets, their rights in the street are in the nature of equitable easements in fee, but, in extent, are substantially the same as when the fee is in them, subject to public use.” Id. §§ 661, 663, 664; Bliss v. Ball, 99 Mass. 597. “Where one’s land is bounded on a public highway,” says Judge Cooley in his work on Torts (page 818), “it presumptively extends, not to the outer line, but to the middle of the road; and his supreme dominion embraces the whole, qualified only by the public easement.” In this respect there is a striking analogy between abutting and riparian owners of the fee, in that a certain incidental, qualified property attaches in the highway, whether it be a public road or navigable water. Bond v. Wool, 107 N. C. 189; Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984. The street consists of the carriage way and sidewalk, the enjoyment and use of both of which are recognized by the courts as the right of the abutting proprietor, of which he cannot be deprived by the municipality, or even by the legislature, without his consent, and without adequate compensation. Moose v. Carson, 104 N. C. 431, 7 L. R. A. 548; State v. Brown, 109 N. C. 805. A municipal corporation, though authorized by statute to widen streets, can do so only where some mode of ascertaining the damage done by taking additional land, and of enforcing its payment is prescribed by law, and pursued by the corporation. On the other hand, a city or town has no right to sell a portion of a street in front of an abutting owner, or to diminish its width in any way, without compensation, and contrary to his wishes. Moose v. Carson, supra. It being conceded that the abutting owner has a qualified property in the street on his front, the only safe criterion by which to test the justice of a claim to any specified right is the consistency or inconsistency of its exercise with the use of the highway by the municipality for corporate purposes. The original owner of the soil surrenders his absolute property in his frontage for a qualified one, in full contemplation of the authority of the corporation, whenever it may become necessary, for public purposes either to elevate or lower the level of the street, though he may suffer some inconvenience from any alteration of the grade; and consequently it is supposed that such damage was considered when the cost of the easement was estimated and paid, or that a donation was made, subject to the contingency of suffering such loss. Guided by the principle stated, this court held that, for loss caused by excavation on embankments made in changing the grade of a street, the abutting owner could not recover, unless the injury was directly due to want of skill or negligence in the excavation of the work. Meares v. Wilmington Comrs. 81 N. C. 78, 49 Am. Dec. 412; Wright v. Wilmington, 93 N. C. 156. In such cases it was considered that the alteration in the highway was not a new taking, but a use of it that was in contemplation at the time when the easement passed to the public. Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 671; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 992, and note. Even this rule, however, has proven so oppressive in practice as to lead, in some of the states, to the enactment of statutes and the amendment of constitutions so as to create a liability as for an original taking, when there is a change of grade, such that damage ensues to an adjacent proprietor. Lewis, Em. Dom. chap. 8, especially section 221. “The public,” says Mr. Lewis, “acquire no right in the use of springs in the highway, and cannot divert them for the purpose of making a public watering place. The owner of the fee cannot change the location of the road where it crosses his land. He may deposit materials on the surface of the way, plant shade or ornamental trees therein, set hitching posts, etc. . . . The public cannot place structures on the soil which have no connection with its use as a highway.” Lewis, Em. Dom. p. 759; Deaton v. Polk County, 9 Iowa, 594. “Subject to the paramount right of the public, the rights of the owner of the fee remain the same as though the public easement did not exist. . . . As against the public, he may make any use of the land which does not interfere with the use and enjoyment of the same as a highway.” Lewis, Em. Dom. p. 758, § 589. The learned author claims for the owner of the fee the right to plant trees in the highway, both for shade and ornament; and it cannot be denied that he acquires a qualified property in the fruit of his labors, when they grow so as to subserve his purpose. It is conceded to be the law in North Carolina that such shade trees can be cut down by a city when the grade is changed, because they are planted in contemplation of the prin ciple that the power to grade is a continuing one, and that, "of the necessity or expediency of its exercise, the governing body of the corporation, and not the courts, is the judge." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 686, and note. But though a tree be planted subject to the right of the city to destroy it, in the exercise of this continuing power to improve its streets, it is nevertheless the property of the owner of the fee; and, when no change of grade is ordered, the governing authorities of the town have the right to remove it only on the ground that it obstructs the highway, and is therefore a public nuisance, or after condemnation, and the payment of compensation ascertained in a mode pointed out by law.

Mr. Wood, in his work on Nuisance (sec. 294), not only agrees with such other able and discriminating text-writers as Judge Dillon, in declaring that the adjacent owner has a property in trees planted in his front, but maintaining that the municipal authorities are responsible if they deal with them as nuisances, when in fact they do not interfere with the ordinary use of the streets and sidewalks. He says "Shade trees set in a street or highway without authority of law, which in any measure obstruct travel, are a nuisance. But they can be removed only by the owner or the public authorities, and, if they [the public authorities] remove them when they do not obstruct travel, they are liable to the owner in damages therefor." See also Clark v. Dasso, 84 Mich. 86. If damage can be recovered, it must, ex necessitate, be assessed by a jury, since it will not be contended that it is a taking in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, for which the law provides any other mode of fixing the compensation. Thus, we find that all of the leading text-writers concur in construing the decisions which I cite to sustain my view, and to have settled the principles in this country, generally, that a shade tree is the property of the abutting owner, which cannot be destroyed, as a nuisance, unless it hinders the free use of the highway by the public, and where it is not an obstruction the owner may recover damages of the authorities of a city for its wrongful removal. In treating of the power to prevent and abate nuisances, Judge Dillon says: "This authority, and its summary exercise, may be constitutionally conferred on the incorporated place, and it authorizes its counsel to act upon that which comes within the legal notion of a nuisance; but such power, conveyed in general terms, cannot be taken to authorize the extrajudicial condemnation and destruction of that, as a nuisance, which, in its nature, situation, or use, is not such. . . . It is a doctrine not to be tolerated in this country that a municipal corporation, without any general laws of the city or of the state, within which a given structure can be shown to be a nuisance, can, by the mere declaration that it is one, subject it to removal by any person supposed to be aggrieved, or even by the city itself." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 374; Everett v. Council Bluffs, 48 Iowa, 66; Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 498, 19 L. ed. 984; State v. Jersey City, 29 N. J. L. 170; Cooley, Const. Lim. 242, 741, note; State v. Mott, 81 Md. 297, 48 Am. Rep. 105; Ward v. Little Rock, 41 Ark. 526, 48 Am. Rep. 46; 24 L. R. A.

Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 70 Ill. 634; Horr & Bemis, Mun. Ord. § 252.

If the destruction of the trees, complained of, is to be imputed to the defendants, it is not contended that there was any other law authorizing the act than the general authority to prevent nuisances. Whether a city acts, in such a case as this, under the general power to abate nuisances, or under special authority to remove obstructions, the rule is the same. "Power to a city, by its charter, to regulate the use of streets and alleys, and to prevent and remove obstructions from them, contemplates the preservation of actual ways against nuisances which interfere with their accustomed use, and until they have become actually open obstructions thereon, under a claim of title apparent on the face of the prosecution, cannot be punished under an ordinance in the municipal tribunal, but the rights of the parties must be determined in the public courts." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. p. 809, § 680, and note; Jackson v. People, 9 Mich. 111, 77 Am. Dec. 491; Phifer v. Cox, 21 Ohio St. 248, 8 Am. Rep. 58. While, in the exercise of the continuing authority to raise or lower the grade of streets, the law requires of the city only good faith, care, and skill, the arbitrary destruction of property, or what is equivalent to its confiscation, cannot be justified on the ground that the act was done under the honest belief that it was a lawful abatement of a nuisance, because it obstructed the highway. If the tree was property, and was not planted in contemplation of legal authority in the city, express or implied, to cut it down at will, but only in view of the possibility of its destruction as a nuisance, then, unquestionably, the plaintiff would have the right to have any disputed facts, such as the question where the tree was standing, tried by a jury, with instruction from the court as to what constituted nuisance such as the city might summarily abate. Good faith will not protect an officer who commits a trespass without the color of authority, and thereby leave remediless one whose property is destroyed without reason or necessity. Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 521. An obstruction is defined as "anything, which, without reasonable necessity, impedes the use of the streets for lawful purposes." Horr & Bemis, Mun. Ord. § 230. "When adjacent owners retain the fee in the streets, the corporation has no right to destroy the trees, unless they grow within the street, or so as to obstruct traffic." Id. § 229; Bliss v. Ball, 99 Mass. 597; White v. Godfrey, 97 Mass. 472; Tainter v. Morristown, 19 N. J. Eq. 46; Cross v. Morristown, 18 N. J. Eq. 813; Bills v. Belknap, 86 Iowa, 588; Everett v. Council Bluffs, supra. Whether trees in a public highway are a public nuisance "is a question of fact for the jury," in all cases. Phifer v. Cox, 21 Ohio St. 248, 8 Am. Rep. 58. If an overseer cuts down a tree which does not obstruct or interfere with the public use of the road, he is a trespasser, and, if he does so maliciously, is liable to exemplary damages. Winter v. Peterson, 24 N. J. L. 524, 61 Am. Dec. 678.

The case of Chase v. Oakley, 81 Wis. 818, 15 L. R. A. 558, may appear upon first view of it, to be in conflict with the general current of authority, and with the cases we have cited, some of which are collated in a note appended to it; but, upon a closer examination, it will appear that the opinion rests upon the ground that the common council are, by special provisions of the charter, to "protect the streets from any encroachment or injury," and "to prevent, prohibit, and cause the removal of all obstructions in and upon all streets in said city." The charter of the city of Greensboro provides for condemnation of property for the purpose of changing or widening the streets already in existence, and laying out new ones, but we find no special warrant for assuming the judicial function of declaring any obstruction in the whole street a nuisance. If the legislature had constituted the mayor and commissioners, or the street committee selected by them, a special court, and had empowered them to remove obstructions which, in their judgment, were nuisances, we would still have been compelled to meet the question whether the legislature could in that indirect way clothe the officers of a municipality with the authority to destroy such private property, and deprive the sufferer of the right to "the ancient mode of trial by jury," guaranteed to him, "in all controversies respecting property," by the constitution (art. 1, § 1), unless the trees had been planted in contemplation of an express power conferred upon the town council to clear all parts of the streets of trees. This grave question does not arise in this case, and the discussion of it is therefore unnecessary. When the point shall be properly presented, it will be necessary to determine whether the legislature can dispense with the right of trial by jury in any case involving the title to property, when the litigant could have claimed it under the ancient common law.

It seems that in the recent case of O'Connor v. Telephone Co., 18 Can. L. T. 886, the appellate court of Nova Scotia has held that the rights of the abutting owner of the fee on a street extended to the middle of the highway, in his front, and that he had a property in ornamental shade trees in the street, in his front, and could maintain an action against a telephone company for damages (to be assessed, of course, by a jury) for mutilating such trees. Says Lawson (Rights, Rem. & Pr. vol. 3, p. 1758): "Adjacent land owners may lawfully use the space between the carriage path and sidewalks for the growing of trees for ornament or use. Trees thus situated are in no sense nuisances, but private property." But the right of property stands upon the more substantial ground of inexorable reason. Since the city does not appropriate the space between the sidewalk and the street for corporate purposes, and the residuary right of the owner of the fee empowers him to use it. Even where the right is in the dominant owner to extend its actual dominion, if it become necessary, no such summary destruction without reason is permitted. Where the fee is condemned for a railway for a distance of 100 feet on either side of the track, while the corporation may build an additional track, if requisite for the transaction of its business, at any time during the period of its corporate existence, or may erect structures for corporate purposes upon the land appropriated, yet if the adjacent owner plant and raise corn within the limit of 100 feet, but not upon the portion of the way actually occupied by the company, the law neither imposes the duty, nor confers the power, on the latter, to cut down such corn, as a nuisance, because it may obstruct the view of the engineer, and prevent him from seeing cattle approaching the line of railway. Ward v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 109 N. C. 858, 118 N. C. 566.

On the other hand, the corporation may, in that case, remove trees, because that is authorized by statute, lest they become a nuisance, by falling upon the track. But the facts are found, and in our opinion the tree was not shown to be a public nuisance, subject to summary removal by the city, but was the property of the plaintiff, for the willful destruction of which an action for damages lies against the trespassers, and those under whose authority they may have acted. There was no pretense of a condemnation for a public purpose, or of authority to take, if it was private property, other than in the mode pointed out in section 60 of the charter,—upon a valuation by three freeholders. There was no evidence that the trees were unsound, so as to endanger the safety of travelers on the highway, and there was no provision of law, in or out of the charter, authorizing the cutting down of trees located on the margin of the sidewalks, or at any point on the streets, to avert danger to the public. The authority to make improvements, given in a charter, like that to widen the streets, was coupled with the condition that commissioners should be appointed to assess any damage that might be caused by the changes made. In the case at bar the court found as a fact that the trees did not obstruct the sidewalk, and, in effect, that they were not nuisances, and, therefore, that there was no authority for destroying them. When such shade trees neither impede the passage of vehicles, nor unreasonably obstruct the sidewalks, the municipal authorities may enact general ordinances to protect them, even against wanton injury or destruction by the owner, but are not empowered, by orders or by laws, to cause them to be removed, as nuisances, when, in law and in fact, they are not nuisances. Horst & Bemis, Mun. Ord. §§ 252, 229; McCarthy v. Boston, 135 Mass. 197; Wood, Nuisances, § 294. An adjacent owner, notwithstanding an order or ordinance of municipal authorities authorizing it, is entitled to recover damages for any invasion of his individual rights, such as the destruction of shade trees in his front, when they do not interfere with the use of the highway for any public purpose whatever. Horst & Bemis, Mun. Ord. § 7; Bliss v. Ball, supra; Wood, Nuisances, § 294; Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 536. And the destruction of shade and ornamental trees located in a public highway in front of the premises of the abutting owner has been held to be an irreparable injury to him, and for that reason has been enjoined, where their removal was not necessary to the enjoyment of the easement by the public. Tainter v. Morristown, 19 N. J. Eq. 46; Cross v. Morristown, 18 N. J. Eq. 805; Bills v. Belknap, 86 Iowa, 583. "As owner of the fee," says Elliott (Roads & Streets, 536), "subject only to the public easement, the abutter [who owns the fee] has all the ordinary remedies of the owner of a freehold. He may maintain trespass against one who unlawfully cuts and carries away the grass, trees, or herbage, and even against one who stands upon the sidewalk in front of his premises, and uses abusive language towards him, refusing to depart." State v. Davis, 80 N. C. 351.

If the shade trees in front of the plaintiff's house were not a nuisance at common law, nor so declared by statute, no ordinance or proceeding of the municipal authorities, or their agents, could justify their destruction, in the face of the objection of the plaintiff's husband. Miller v. Burgh, 32 Tex. 208, 5 Am. Rep. 242; Yates v. Milwaukee, supra; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 874-879, Ezeret v. Council Bluffs, 46 Iowa, 66; Cooley, Const. Lim., supra; Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, supra.

The three oak trees cut down by the street force, in obedience to the command of the defendant's street committeemen, King and Scott, after securing the approval of Mendenhall, of the same committee, stood at the outer edge of a sidewalk eight feet wide, and within the line of the curbing, and, being directly in front of the plaintiff's dwelling house, contributed to the comfort of its inmates. The space between the trees and the inner line of the sidewalk was not uniform in width. It averaged eight, but was at no point less than seven, feet in width, and was found by the court to be sufficiently wide to afford "room for persons to pass in the usual manner without inconvenience." The judge below found, also, that "the leaves on said trees obstructed the rays of the sun, and so shaded the street as to cause it to be and continue damp for a portion of the time." The finding excludes the idea that the trees were a nuisance, in obstructing the sidewalk; and the mere fact that the shade was so dense as to cause occasional dampness under it is not satisfactory evidence that they so interfered with the use of the street as to constitute them a nuisance. Bliss v. Ball, supra. It is a matter of common observation that all trees which subserve the purpose of shading the ground prevent the earth, within the line of their shadows, from becoming dry so soon as the surrounding space. And the commissioners were not authorized, because they had created a stench by filling a hole near the trees with green limbs, to declare them a nuisance, as the cause of the offensive odor, since the court finds that, after removing them, the municipal authorities, by filling the hole with stone, put the street in good condition, and that this remedy could have been effectually used without molesting the trees at all. So far from showing that the removal was demanded for the benefit or convenience of the public, the conclusion of fact submitted by the court sustains the contention of the plaintiff, that, being within the curbing (but seven feet or more from the fence), the trees neither obstructed the sidewalk, nor the twenty-three feet of carriageway; that the hole could and would have been filled with stone or earth; and that, if the dampness under the dense foliage of the trees made them a nuisance, every shade tree that subserves the purpose of planting it, if it casts a shadow upon a highway, would be liable to destruction at the arbitrary bidding of any agent of a town who might be intrusted with the duty of repairing its streets. Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. p. 1758, § 1088. The statutes which in some states protect such trees are in affirmance of the principle that the owner surrenders to the public only such dominion over the land as he could not exercise without interfering with the easement of the public for use as a highway. The admitted right of an abutting owner, under the common law, to the herbage, and to sue, or sometimes cause to be indicted and punished criminally, for a forcible trespass committed on the highway in his front, is an illustration of this well-established principle.

It is urged, however, on behalf of the city of Greensboro, that it cannot be held answerable for the trespass committed under the direction of the defendants King and Scott, because it appears that "no action was taken, or order made, by the board of aldermen, in respect to the removal of the trees, nor was any report made by the street committee to the said board with regard to their action in the premises." It was provided in section 12, chapter 1, of the City Ordinances, that a number of committees, composed of four aldermen each, should be appointed from the members of the board to take charge of certain departments of the municipal government; and among them was that composed of defendants King and Scott, and Aldermen Glenn and Mendenhall, who, by the terms of the next section, were intrusted with the "control and supervision of all matters relating to the streets, sidewalks, and pumps of the city," etc. This appointment, without any further recognition of their acts, constituted King and Scott the agents of the city for the supervision of the streets, and all that could be done for the improvement and reparation of them. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 979 (777). "Towns, counties, villages, and cities must respond for such torts of their officers, agents, and servants as have been suffered or committed by corporate authority." Cooley, Torts, p. 123. As agents, the relation of the members of the committee to the town was legally the same as that of any servant to his master; and the responsibility of the municipality, as superior, is likewise governed by the rules applicable to such relation. Where a trespass is committed in the course of the employment of an agent or a servant, and is intended and believed by the trespasser to operate for the benefit of his superior, though it may be willful, such superior is none the less answerable for damages. 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 151; Cooley, Torts, p. 586; 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 252, 253, note 1; Johnson v. Barber, 10 Ill. 425, 50 Am. Dec. 416; Limpus v. London General Omnibus Co. 1 Hurlst. & C. 526. "If, in exercising its power to open or improve streets, or to make drains or sewers, the agents or officers of a municipal corporation, under its authority or direction, commit a trespass, or take possession of private property, without complying with the charter or statute, the corporation is liable in damages therefor. In such cases, also, an action will lie against a city corporation by the owner of land through which its agents have unlawfully made a sewer, or for trees destroyed and injuries done by them." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 974 (773). "Where the working and repair of streets is treated [as in North Caro[line] as a municipal duty, and the officer in charge as a corporate, in distinction from an independent, public officer, or where the injury was negligently caused by such officer in the process of executing upon the streets an authorized corporate improvement or work for them, the doctrine of respondet superior would apply." Id. §§ 979 (777), 980 (778), 983. If, then, the city was acting through the members of the committee, as its agents, it was in the exercise of its ministerial or corporate, as distinguished from its judicial, legislative, or discretionary, duties, and was therefore answerable, as superior, for such acts, done in the course of their employment, as were manifestly intended to inure to the benefit of the corporation. Moffitt v. Asheville, 108 N. C. 287; Cooley, Torts, pp. 619, 622. The implication from the finding of the court, if that was necessary, is that the committee "concurrent in the conclusion that the trees should be removed" in order to improve the street, and that King and Scott, as aldermen, intended to benefit the corporation when they directed the street force to do the work. They then sustained the same relation to the municipality that a conductor or other agent bears to a quasi public corporation, such as a railroad or street-car company; and it is well settled by numberless cases that though the agent or servant of such corporations may willfully commit a trespass in the course of his employment, yet if the act is done with the belief that it will benefit the principal or master, and the intention to advance its interest, the principle of respondet superior applies. Moore v. Fitchburg R. Corp. 4 Gray, 465, 64 Am. Dec. 88; Shea v. Sixth Avenue R. Co. 62 N. Y. 180, 20 Am. Rep. 480; Seymour v. Greenwood, 6 Hurlst. & N. 359; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 150; Cooley, Torts, pp. 538-537; Lampus v. London General Omnibus Co. supra; Pollock, Torts, p. 15.

But not only is the corporation responsible for acts done by its agents in the execution of the duties assigned to them, but a joint action for the tort will be against the company and the servant. Hewitt v. Swift, 8 Allen, 420; Johnson v. Barber, supra; Wright v. Wilcox, 19 Wend. 843, 82 Am. Dec. 507. The law is founded upon the highest conceptions of natural justice. It is impracticable for a mayor and board of commissioners to move in a body along every street of a city, and sit in a judgment upon the proposed removal of a tree. A city must work through agents constituted by its governing authorities; and, when an agency is intrusted to a street committee there is no principle of law, reason, or justice that will relieve the municipality of liability for their torts, when engaged in the business intrusted to it, because the committee did not desist on an objection to the removal of the tree, stop the street force from work, and call a meeting of the council to authorize or ratify the act. The town, when engaged in the improvement of its streets, or in the performance of any act intended for the benefit of the municipality, is liable both for the negligence and willful torts of its agents, just as when an officer or servant of a quasi public corporation commits little overt acts, or negligently omits to discharge his duty, he subjects the company that he represents to liability for consequent injury.

Moffitt v. Asheville, supra; Cooley, Torts, p. 619. If a director of a railroad company were appointed to act as conductor, the company could not escape liability for removing a passenger on the ground that by disorderly conduct he had been guilty of nuisance, when in fact his acts did not justify the conductor in ejecting him. The committee were not the less agents of the town council because they were selected from the body itself. It is a well-known fact that the governing authorities of our towns usually, if not universally, intrust the management of improvements, not involving the condemnation of private property, to committees selected from their own bodies. To absolve the towns from liability for a trespass committed by such agents, or under their direction, for the benefit of the corporation, when, in many cases, such committeemen are irresponsible primarily, would be to countenance oppression, and, in some instances, what would be equivalent to confiscation. An ordinance provided that the street committee "shall have control and supervision of all matters relating to streets, sidewalks, and pumps, and shall determine the amount of labor and material to be used, . . . and shall report to the board from time to time, and perform the duties imposed upon them by the board of aldermen." Would the ordinary regulation that a conductor should report to the president of the company, or superintendent, the fact that he had ejected a passenger, excuse the company from responsibility for injury caused by a wrongful expulsion? When acting for its own benefit, a municipality stands upon precisely the same footing, as to liability for the acts of its agents, as does a quasi public corporation. See Moffitt v. Asheville, supra, and authorities cited. Suppose such a corporation should, by means of a by-law, declare the conductor, engineer, baggage master, and flagman a committee to have control of the question of ejecting drunken or disorderly passengers, or such as failed to secure tickets or pay fare. Would the corporation be allowed to evade liability for the wrongful, willful and violent expulsion of a passenger by the conductor and baggage-man after consulting the flagman, because the engineer did not approve the act till it was communicated? Cooley, Torts, p. 539. To apply the same principle to such agencies as govern in questions of the right of the directors of private corporations to bind their companies would be the entering wedge to the destruction of all corporate liability for the torts of agents and servants. Means would be found, by ingenious regulations, to leave the public at the mercy or caprice of irresponsible and reckless agents and servants, were the possibility of putting the corporation behind such bulwarks once suggested. The right to trial by jury is none the less a constitutional right because juries are sometimes misled by prejudice. The corrective for such an evil, if it exists, is the enactment of statutes requiring greater care in their selection, not judicial legislation restricting the operation of the original law. Says Judge Cooley in his work on Torts (page 122): "Towns, counties, villages, and cities must respond for such torts of their officers, agents, and servants as have been committed or suffered by corporate authorities." "It is not merely for the wrongful act that the agent or servant is directed to do, but the wrongful act he is suffered to do, that the city is responsible." Id. p. 584. It was the duty of the city to see that its agents were attentive and prudent, and so conducted its business as not needlessly to injure others. Com. v. Nichols, 10 Met. 259, 43 Am. Dec. 432. The law presumes that the city looks after its street force; and the fact that it was engaged, two or three days after the order was given by Scott and King, in removing the trees, is evidence that the mayor and commissioners knowingly suffered the removal to be made. They knew, or ought to have known, what these paid laborers were doing. I think, therefore, that there was error in the ruling of the court below that the action could not be maintained either against the city, or the two aldermen in their individual capacity. The two aldermen were guilty of a willful trespass, for which the corporation became liable, because it was committed in the attempt to discharge their duty to the corporation, as agents named in the ordinance, and with the intent to improve the streets. The act being willful, the agents were not relieved of responsibility because the principals were made answerable. The committee were not a corporation, but were the authorized agents of the town; and it was not essential that they should meet like stockholders, at an appointed time or place. The question is not whether they could bind a municipality by a contract, but whether, as its servants acting within the line of duty prescribed for them, they could make the city a joint tortfeasor with them. It was sufficient, I think, that a majority agreed upon a certain course of conduct, and their purpose was carried out by the laborers at the bidding of two of the number, and they were not acting in strict conformity, as stockholders, to the terms of a charter, but were agents carrying out a common purpose to cause a trespass to be committed.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

STATE of Maryland, for Use of Isabel Collins
HARTLOVE et al., Appts.,

M. FOX & SON.

(.....Md.....)

- 1. The sale by false representations to an innocent purchaser of property known to the seller to be imminently dangerous to human beings and likely to cause them injury renders the seller liable for resulting injury not only to the purchaser but to such persons as may in ordinary course of events be called upon to take charge of the property for him.
- 2. Glanders is not a disease so frequently taken by man as to permit the court to take judicial notice that it is imminently dangerous to human beings.
- 3. The fraudulent sale of a horse by one who knows that it has a contagious disease such as glanders to one who is ignorant of the fact will render the seller liable for the death of one who contracts the disease while in charge of the horse for the purchaser only in case such death is a natural and probable consequence of contact with the horse.
- 4. A declaration in an action for causing the death of a person by contact with a diseased animal fraudulently sold by the defendant should allege that the death was the natural and probable consequence of contact with the animal.

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court of Baltimore City in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to compel defendants to pay damages for the death of John W. Hartlove, which was alleged to have resulted from their wrongful act. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. W. L. Marbury and William L. Hodge, for appellants:

The right which these plaintiffs claim is the same right which the person actually injured in such a case would undoubtedly have. The plaintiffs do not pretend that the deceased had any superior rights to the rest of the public by reason of his relationship to W. H. Hartlove, but his rights are certainly no less than those of other persons.

When this contract was made between Fox & Son and Wm. H. Hartlove, was the vendor under no obligation except his obligation to the vendee? Did he not invade the rights of the public when he set out into the community an animal which he knew was dangerous to every human being brought in communication with her—when he increased that danger by falsely misrepresenting the character of the mare's sickness?

NOTE.—The subject of negligence in respect to particularly dangerous things whether sold to or left in the way of people who do not know of the danger is essentially a modern one although it is clearly a mere special development of the general doctrine of negligence, making the duty correspond with the danger.

As to killing horse infected with glanders, see Miller v. Horton (Mass.) 10 L. R. A. 116.

There are any number of precisely analogous cases, in which this point has been decided.

The American courts hold that this class of cases are wrongs because they violate a duty owed to the public, and not owing to the violation of any duty imposed by contract.

1 Wait, Act. & Def. 186.

The English view is different.

The stranger to the contract, to recover must show that his injury was the result of a false representation, "made with the intent that it should be acted on by such third person."

Benjamin, Sales, 6th ed. p. 380.

The American rule is criticised in the leading English case.

Heaven v. Pender, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 514.

There is very good authority that throws doubt on Mr. Benjamin's view of the law of England, if taken without qualification.

1 Wait, Act. & Def. 188.

The only question possible to raise in this case is this: Was the death of John W. Hartlove caused by the wrong of Fox & Son? Does this declaration show that this wrong was the proximate cause of this injury, as the law views proximate cause?

If the original act was wrongful, and would naturally, according to the ordinary course of events, prove injurious to some other person or persons, and does actually result in injury through the intervention of other causes which are not wrongful, the injury shall be referred to the wrongful cause, passing by those which were innocent.

Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. p. 78.

To entitle a wrongdoer to exemption, he must show not only that the same loss might have happened, but that it must have happened if the act complained of had not been done.

Davis v. Garrett, 6 Bing. 716; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Reaney, 42 Md. 137; Annapolis & E. R. Co. v. Gann, 89 Md. 143; Baltimore & S. R. Co. v. Woodruff, 4 Md. 242, 59 Am. Dec. 72.

The first cause which the declaration sets out as leading to the death of John W. Hartlove was the fraudulent sale by Fox & Son of an animal which, as they knew, was dangerous to every human being brought in contact with it. Now, have the remaining events set out followed naturally from this first one, or has the chain been broken by some supervening cause?

Addison, Torts, 6th ed. 48 et seq.

The next event in the chain was that the purchaser believed the false statements of the defendants, bought the mare and carried her away. There is certainly nothing in this except the natural consequence of the first wrongful act.

Clark v. Chambers, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 327; Pollock, Torts, p. 83.

The last event was that the purchaser took the horse off to be attended to for him by another person, who was killed. Is this anything unusual?

Vandenburgh v. Truax, 4 Denio, 464, 47 Am. Dec. 268.

The intention of this fraudulent vendor is absolutely immaterial in this case.

Mr. T. R. Clendinen, for appellees:

In George v. Skivington, L. R. 5 Exch. 1, which was an action by the wife of a man to whom a druggist had sold a compound for the use of his wife, with knowledge that it was to be so used by and for her, and injury having resulted, for which she brought suit, Piggot, J., said, page 4: "The case, no doubt, would have been very different if the declaration had not alleged that the defendant knew for whom the compound had been intended." And, again, goes on to say: "Suppose, for example, a chemist sells to a customer a drug, without any knowledge of the purpose to which it is to be applied, which is fit for a grown person, and that drug is afterwards given by the purchaser to a child and does injury, it could never be contended that the chemist was liable."

Applying these principles to the present case, we insist that nothing has been alleged entitling appellants to recover.

No action growing out of the contract can be sustained (by a third person) and except by parties or proxies.

Longmeid v. Holliday, 6 Exch. 761.

A volunteer (spectator in that case) cannot recover for an injury.

Scanlon v. Wedger, 16 L. R. A. 395, 156 Mass. 462.

Assuming that defendants made false and fraudulent representations to the vendee, which, however, is not alleged, still deceased's family can have no action, because these representations were not made to deceased, nor with the direct intent that he should act upon them in the manner which occasioned his death.

In Heaven v. Pender, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 503, Brett, M. R., laid down this principle: "Whenever one person supplies goods or machinery or the like, for the purpose of their being used by another person under such circumstances that every one of ordinary sense would, if he thought, recognize at once that unless he used ordinary care and skill with regard to the condition of the thing supplied or the mode of supplying it, there will be danger of injury to the person or property of him for whose use the thing is supplied and who is to use it, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill as to the condition or manner of supplying such thing." Even this principle would not cover the present case; yet the court refused to concur in it, considering it not supported by the decisions.

The fact that the sale may have been unlawful does not increase plaintiff's rights.

Ill v. Balls, 2 Hurlst. & N. 298.

Boyd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A demurrer to the declaration filed in this case was sustained by the superior court of Baltimore city. Judgment was entered on the demurrer and an appeal taken to this court. It, therefore, becomes necessary for us to ascertain what facts are alleged as the basis of the suit—they being admitted by the demurrer to be true.

The plaintiffs allege that the defendants are dealers in horses, and proprietors of a livery and sale stable, and had in their possession a mare which was "affected with a contagious and infectious disease called 'glanders,' a disease which is not only fatal to horses, but which may easily be communicated to human beings who happen to be brought into contact with horses suffering therefrom;" that the defendants, well knowing that the mare was suffering from said disease, the dangerous character of the disease, and that it was dangerous to human life, in disregard of the statutes of this state relative thereto, negligently and willfully exposed the mare for sale, and did sell her to one William H. Hartlove for the sum of $75; that said William H. Hartlove, not knowing of the true condition of said mare, or that she had said disease, but relying upon and believing the assurance given him by the defendant that she was suffering from nothing worse than a bad cold, paid for said mare, took her away and placed her in another stable where she could be, and, has in fact (been), attended to and treated by John W. Hartlove, a brother of William H. Hartlove, the husband of one of the equitable plaintiffs, and the father of the others. They further allege that John W. Hartlove, "while attending to said mare, and using due care, and not knowing that she had said disease, contracted the same and died."

Article 67, section 1, of our Code provides that "whenever the death of a person shall be caused by a wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued, shall be liable to an action of damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, etc."

We are therefore to determine whether under the facts admitted by the demurrer John W. Hartlove, if he had survived, could have recovered under this declaration. It is said in Benjamin on Sales, section 481, that "a man may make himself liable on an action founded on tort, for fraud or deceit or negligence, in respect of a contract, brought by parties with whom he has not contracted, by a stranger, by any one of the public at large who may be injured by such deceit or negligence," although this statement is somewhat qualified in the later edition of that work.

The main difficulty consists in applying the principles applicable to such actions to the facts of the particular cases.

We will therefore examine into some of the authorities which have been brought to our attention to ascertain what the various courts have determined, with a view of applying what we deem to be the correct principles to the circumstances of this case. The case of Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455, is one of those mainly relied on by appellants.

It has probably gone further than most of the cases, and has been somewhat criticised by some authorities. It must be conceded that the facts of that case differ in some material respects from the one we now have under consideration.

It very clearly decides, however, that the fact that the plaintiff was not a party to the contract with the defendant, but purchased the article in question from a druggist, who had bought it from another druggist, the vendee of the defendant, did not preclude a recovery. The action was founded on the negligence of the defendants, whose agent had negligently labeled a jar of what was in fact belladonna "½ lb. dandelion," etc. By reason of this negligent labeling the intermediate vendors, as well as the plaintiff, were led to believe that it was the extract of dandelion, which was harmless, and did not know it was belladonna, which was poisonous. The court, on page 409, said: "In the present case, the sale of the poisonous article was made to a dealer in drugs, and not to a consumer; the injury, therefore, was not likely to fall on him, or on his vendee, who was also a dealer, but much more likely to be visited on a remote purchaser, as actually happened. The defendants' negligence put human life in imminent danger.

The defendants' duty arose out of the nature of his business and the danger to others incident to its mismanagement."

On page 410 it is said: "In Longmead v. Holliday, 6 Exch. 761, the distinction is recognized between an act of negligence imminently dangerous to the lives of others, and one that is not so. In the former case the party guilty of the negligence is liable to the party injured, whether there be a contract between them or not; in the latter the negligent party is liable only to the party with whom he contracted, and on the ground that negligence is a breach of the contract."

As the defendant was the cause of the injury to the plaintiff, without any intervening negligence of others, and it was "an act of negligence imminently dangerous to the lives of others," he was very properly held liable, although no fraud was proven or alleged.

In Loop v. Litchfield, 42 N. Y. 351, 1 Am. Rep. 548, it was held that the vendor of an article of his own manufacture is not liable to one who uses the same, with the consent of the purchaser, for injuries resulting from a defect therein, unless such article is in its nature "imminently dangerous."

See also Loose v. Clute, 51 N. Y. 494, 10 Am. Rep. 638; in Davidson v. Nichols, 11 Allen, 514, it was held that the sale of an article in itself harmless, and which only became dangerous by being used in combination with some other article, without knowledge by the vendor that it was to be so used, did not make him liable to the purchaser from the original vendee for an injury sustained by him while using it in combination with the other article, notwithstanding it was different from that which was intended to be sold. The facts of that case did not disclose any duty or obligation which rested on the defendant toward the plaintiff in the sale of the article. The court said: "We know of no duty or principle of law by which a vendor of an article can be held liable for mistakes in the nature or quality of the article arising from his carelessness and negligence, which causes loss or injury to other persons than his immediate vendee, when there has been no fraudulent or false representation in the sale, and the article sold was in itself harmless; especially when the sale is made without any notice to the vendor that the article is bought for a third person," etc.

In McDonald v. Snelling, 14 Allen, 294, 92 Am. Dec. 768, the court said: "When a right or duty is created only by contract, it can only be enforced between the contracting parties. But when the defendant has violated a duty imposed on him by the common law, it seems just and reasonable that he should be held liable to every person injured, whose injury is the natural and probable consequence of the misconduct. . . . An action can be maintained only when there is shown to be, first, a misfeasance or negligence in some particular as to which there was a duty towards the party injured or the community generally; and secondly, when it is apparent that the harm to the person or property of another which has actually ensued was reasonably likely to ensue from the act or omissions complained of."

In Wellington v. Downer Kerosene Oil Co., 104 Mass. 64, the court decided that where the defendant sold naphtha to a retail dealer to be sold by him to be used in lamps for illuminating purposes the defendant knowing it to be explosive and dangerous to life when so used and that the retail dealer's purpose was to sell the same, and the latter sold it to the plaintiff without either of them knowing its dangerous qualities, he was held liable and was bound to compensate, as a natural and probable consequence of his unlawful act, that it might explode or ignite and injure an innocent purchaser or his property and must answer in damages for such a consequence if it should come to pass. It was held in Jeffrey v. Bigelow, 18 Wend. 518, 28 Am. Dec. 476, that the sale of animals which had a contagious disease, known to the vendor but not to the vendee, was a fraud. This is approved of in Cooley on Torts, 1st ed. 481, where it is also said that the fraud would not only be more censurable, but more clearly actionable, if that which is exposed to injury by the concealment is the health or life of human beings. See also Wood, Nuisance, § 146.

Hill v. Balls, 2 Hurlst. & N. 299, is in conflict with Jeffrey v. Bigelow, supra, so far as holding the concealment of the contagious disease to be a fraud, but it does not go to the extent of deciding that if in point of fact there was actual fraud or misrepresentation the vendor would not be responsible for all consequences which naturally resulted from the fraudulent sale. In the cases of Langridge v. Levy, 2 Mees. & W. 519, 4 Mees. & W. 339, and George v. Skivington, L. R. 5 Exch. 1, the defendants sold the respective articles for the use of the parties injured, knowing that they were to be so used by them and hence they present some different features from the case at bar.

Such cases as Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 Mees. & W. 109, and Collis v. Selden, L. R. 3 C. P. 495, are in harmony with Loop v. Litchfield, and Loose v. Clute, above referred to.

The defendants in those cases owed no duty to the plaintiffs on account of the respective contracts, and the articles sold and the work done were not of such a character as to be necessarily dangerous to those using them or being where they were, and hence they were not bound either by contract or by any considerations of public policy or safety. Farrant v. Barnes, 11 C. B. N. S. 553, is to the same effect as Thomas v. Winchester, and McDonald v. Snelling, as it was decided upon the principle that a man who delivered an article which he knows to be dangerous or noxious to another person without notice of its nature and qualities is liable for any injury which may likely result, and which does in fact result therefrom to that person or any other who is not himself informed. In Heaven v. Pender, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 503 Cotton, L. J., in delivering the opinion of the majority of the court, and in declining to concur in all the principles enunciated by the master of rolls, said: "I no way intimate any doubt as to the principle that any one who leaves a dangerous instrument, as a gun, in such a way as to cause danger, or who without due warning supplies to others for use an instrument or thing which to his knowledge, from its construction or otherwise, is in such a condition as to cause danger not necessarily incident to such an instrument or thing, is liable for injury caused to others by reason of his negligent act."

The appellee has cited Benjamin on Sales, ed. 1888, Barry v. Croskey, 2 Johns. & H. 1, and other authorities to establish the principle that a false representation made by one person to another, upon which a third person acts, and so acting, was injured, does not give such third person a right of action, unless such false representation was made with the intent that it should be acted upon by him in the manner that occasions the injury or loss. That may be a correct doctrine as far as it goes, as established by the English courts, but we do not understand it to be the law as settled by the courts of this country, unless it be taken with the further qualification that if the act done violates a duty owed to the particular person injured or to the public the defendant will be liable to a third person. We are not prepared to announce as the law of this state that a vendor can, by means of false representations as to the character and condition of the thing sold, induce his vendee to purchase it from him, thereby causing him innocently to subject a third person to the injury which naturally comes from coming in contact with the thing purchased, and still in all cases excuse liability to such third person, unless the latter can establish that such false representations were made with direct intent of their being acted on by him in the manner that occasions the injury.

We have referred to a number of cases which present various phases of such questions as may reflect upon the one before us. Without deeming it necessary to pass upon all of them, or to go to the full extent that Thomas v. Winchester has gone, we are of the opinion that the authorities and a proper regard for the protection of innocent persons fully justify us in the conclusion that if a vendor sells any property, which he knows to be imminently dangerous to human beings and likely to cause them injury, to an innocent vendee who is not aware of the danger and to whom false representations have been made as an inducement to the sale, he may under proper allegation and proof be held responsible not only to the vendee but to such person or persons as the vendee may in the ordinary course of events call upon to take charge of the property for him.

It only remains for us to determine whether the allegations made in the declaration bring this case within the above rule.

It is true that it alleges that the defendants knew that the disease of glanders was dangerous to human life, and that it may be easily communicated to human beings who happen to be brought into contact with horses suffering therefrom. It does not, however, allege that there is any imminent or serious danger of human beings contracting the disease. The allegation that "it may easily be communicated to human beings is not sufficient, being too indefinite and general to bring the case within what we deem to be the correct principle applicable to such cases. The declaration should allege not only that the disease was imminently dangerous, or something to that effect, but the natural or probable consequence of human beings coming into contact was that they would contract it. Glanders is not a disease so frequently taken by man, as to permit the court to take judicial notice of its character. Instances are probably very rare where they have contracted the disease. It may be true that if the disease is taken by a man his life will be in great danger, but is there great or imminent danger of him getting it by simply coming in contact with it? Is that the natural and probable result to be expected? The declaration must not leave to conjecture or implication anything that is material.

In such cases as Thomas v. Winchester, supra, the defendants were held liable for the negligent sale of poison because the probable result and natural consequences of the use of poison is the death of or injury to the person taking it, but in cases of this character it may not follow as a necessary or probable consequence that human beings will be injured as they may come in contact with glandered animals without contracting the disease. The declaration should have presented such a case as showed that the defendant owed a duty to the deceased not to fraudulently expose him to a disease which would probably result in his injury by coming in contact with it. But it is also defective in not stating that John W. Hartlove contracted the disease as the probable and natural consequence of his attending to the mare. If his case is a rare exception and a very unusual result from there coming in contact with the disease, it would not do to hold the defendants responsible for his death.

In such a case they could not have been held to have reasonably contemplated such a result from their conduct. It would be carrying the principle too far and beyond what we believe to be authorized by the authorities. The declaration simply alleges that John W. Hartlove, while attending to said mare, and using due care, and not knowing that she had said disease, contracted the same and did die. It should have alleged that he contracted the disease as the probable and natural consequence of his being brought in contact with it or something to that effect, and it would have been proper to set out more fully John W. Hartlove's connection with the case so as to show that he was in the employ of or had been called in by the purchaser to attend to or treat the animal. For although we think it can be gathered from the declaration that John W. Hartlove was acting for his brother, and was not a mere volunteer or intermeddler, it is not very explicit in that respect. What we have said above concerning the right of one not a party to a contract, to sue, has been on the assumption that the declaration does show that John W. Hartlove was attending to the mare at the instance of his brother, and for that reason we think the plaintiff could sue the defendants, provided the circumstances were such as to justify it and proper allegations were made, as we do not mean to decide that any third person, without his being in some way connected with the purchaser, could sue.

Being of the opinion that the declaration has not made out such a case as calls upon the defendants to plead, we think the demurrer was properly sustained, and will therefore affirm the judgment, but we will remand the case so that the plaintiffs can amend the declaration if they see proper to do so.

Judgment affirmed with costs and cause remanded.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

Jerome F. MANNING

v.
Benjamin F. LEIGHTON.

(65 Vt. 84.)

1. The settlement of an estate in a foreign jurisdiction will not be held to bar a claim against the administrator arising after the death of the deceased upon a showing only that a claim against an estate must be filed within a certain time after the issue of letters and that notice was given the claimant but no claim was filed, since ordinarily those referred to as creditors of an estate are persons holding claims against the deceased in his lifetime and the requirements as to the presentation of claims do not ordinarily refer to liabilities incurred by the administrator.
2. The provisions of the Act of Congress of June 5, 1888, re-establishing the court of Alabama claims and authorizing the rendition of judgments in the mode and subject to the conditions, limitations, and provisions of the Act of 1874, originally establishing such court, revives the provision that the court shall on motion allow the compensation of attorneys and enter it as part of its judgment and that all other liens upon the judgment shall be of no effect.
3. The right of an attorney to assert a lien upon a recovery on a claim against the United States under an agreement for a conditional fee is inconsistent with

U. S. Rev. Stat., § 8477, providing that all transfers and assignments of any claim upon the United States or of any interest therein shall be absolutely null and void unless made with certain formalities, and after the allowance of the claim and the issuing of a warrant therefor.

4. Claims under the Act of Congress of June 5, 1882, for damage on the high seas by confederate cruisers and for premiums charged for war risks after the sailing of any confederate cruiser although to be satisfied out of a particular fund without further responsibility on the part of the United States, are since the money had been covered into the treasury and the right to it was to be established by legal proceedings, within the provisions of U. S. Rev. Stat., § 8477, making void all transfers and assignments of any claim upon the United States before the allowance of the claim and the issuing of the warrant so as to prevent a lien in favor of an attorney under an agreement for a conditional fee for their prosecution.
5. An attorney who has rendered services in the recovery of a claim from the United States which has finally been recovered by the administrator of the beneficiary through another attorney cannot impose a lien upon the fund where such administrator had no further notice of the lien than the mere knowledge that such attorney had rendered services in connection with the claims, nor can he hold him personally liable although he has paid over the fund to the persons entitled.
6. An attorney's lien is either a retain-

NORM.—What assets will give jurisdiction to appoint administrator.

There are few cases in which the appointment of an administrator has been set aside because of lack of assets to sustain the jurisdiction. More cases can be found in which the assets have been held sufficient to support the jurisdiction, but the body of the law upon this subject seems to be continued in dicta, more or less authoritative, uttered during the discussion of kindred subjects.

The subject is to a large extent governed by statutory provisions. The old English law upon the subject is only to a limited extent applicable in this country, but it has nevertheless become the foundation, for most of the decisions which were not controlled by statute.

The Tennessee court in considering the effect of the English law upon the right to grant administration upon a judgment says: "We understand that law to be merely a local rule or principle of probate jurisdiction for the purpose of regulating or determining the right of granting letters testamentary or of administration as between the different diocesan or prerogative courts within that country." Swanoy v. Scott, 9 Humph. 327.

While we have here no system of superior probate jurisdiction such as was in vogue in England by which in case of assets within the jurisdiction of more than one inferior official, an official whose jurisdiction extends over both localities can grant the administration and thus save conflicts, and while the jurisdiction first assumed is either exclusive as when the assets all lie within the same state, or is practically ignored as when they are in different states, yet many of the rules formulated there and much of the nomenclature have been adopted here.

What value necessary.

In England there seems to have been no reason why administration could not have been granted by the ordinary in any case, no matter how small the amount, but in case of assets in more than one diocese, so as to make a conflict of jurisdiction and bring the case within the power of the archbishop, the value of the estate must have been, as finally fixed, five pounds. Viner's Abr. Executors, I.

In this country the rule fixing the jurisdiction of the ordinary rather than that of the archbishop seems to have been generally adopted.

In a Massachusetts case it was said that no particular amount of goods is necessary. Pinney v. McGregory, 102 Mass. 186.

So some articles of furniture and personalty, though of small value, were held to be sufficient in Harrington v. Brown, 5 Pick. 521.

A Japanese folding chair will give jurisdiction. White v. Nelson, 2 Dem. 265.

In Nan Gliesen v. Bridgford, 83 N. Y. 355, jurisdiction was attempted to be founded on the existence of an old family Bible and a pair of ear-rings, but it was refused partly because of lapse of time, the time since the death of decedent being about 200 years, and partly because of failure to identify the articles as those of decedent.

So slaves are assets. Henderson v. Clarke, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 277.

And a mansion house and goods and chattels are sufficient to sustain the appointment of an administrator. Emerson v. Ross, 17 Fla. 122.

But the interest of decedent must, it seems, at least appear to have some value.

Thus proof that decedent was defendant in an action pending at the time of his death, in which his personal property was attached, and that it was afterwards surrendered and removed from the state upon the execution by a third person of an accountable receipt therefor to the officer, and that deceased was mortgagee of real estate in a mort-ing or a charging lien. The former is based upon the possession of money or papers, and expires when the possession ends; the latter is the right to make the claim for compensation a charge upon the judgment and is not perfected until notice is given the defendant.

7. An administrator of the beneficiary of a claim against the United States appointed to meet a requirement of the court and taking charge of the case with its approval, does not by making use of proofs procured by a former attorney accept the benefit of the latter's services so as to render himself liable to pay for them where such proofs were in the files of the court and beyond the control of such attorney and he has no knowledge that the attorney whom he employs has made an arrangement with the former attorney who is relying on him to act in his interest.

8. The appointment of an administrator cannot be collaterally attacked because the petition for administration fails to allege the death of the intestate since the jurisdiction of the court did not depend upon the formality of the petition or adherence to any technical rule of the procedure.

9. He who questions the validity of an administration has the burden of establishing its invalidity where the facts of the death of the person upon whose estate letters are granted and of the existence of assets within the jurisdiction appear upon the record as judicially ascertained.

10. A general finding by a referee that a party was duly appointed administrator of the estate of a person referred to as deceased throughout the report is sufficient to sustain the administration were nothing further appears in the record to enable the appellate court to judge of its legality.

11. A claim against the United States under the Act of Congress of 1882, providing for the distribution of the award for the Alabama depredation is property in the jurisdiction of the courts of the District of Columbia, authorizing the appointment there of an administrator of the deceased claimant.

12. The appointment of an administrator cannot be collaterally attacked on the ground that the petition falsely represented the petitioner to be a creditor of the intestate where neither the residence of a creditor within the jurisdiction nor the application of one is essential to the jurisdiction.

13. One entitled to administration who stands by with knowledge of the application of another for appointment and the fact that he is administering upon the estate, is estopped to assert his prior right and claim the appointment made to be invalid.

14. A judgment of the court of Alabama claims making an award to an ancillary administrator appointed in the District of Columbia cannot be collaterally attacked on the ground that foreign administrators were entitled to recognition.

15. An ancillary administrator is not liable to pay for services contracted for by the foreign administrators, since there is no privity between them.

(December 13, 1892.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to a pro forma judgment in favor of plaintiff entered up-age not discharged of record, though the debt was paid, does not show sufficient assets to support administration. Crosby v. Leavitt, 4 Allen, 410.

So partnership real estate standing in the name of the deceased partner is not assets which will authorize the appointment of an administrator for him, if the entire assets of the firm are not enough to pay their debts and the surviving partner has made an assignment for creditors. Shaw, Appellant, 51 Me. 207.

But in Maine to authorize administration there must be personal estate to the value of $20 or real estate and debts amounting to that sum. Bean v. Bumpus, 22 Me. 549; Gross v. Howard, 52 Me. 132.

Where assets are regarded as located.

For the purpose of determining the question whether or not there were assets in the diocese of more than one ordinary so as to bring the case within the jurisdiction of the archbishop certain rules were established which are applicable upon the question, What are assets? As a general rule it may be said that everything belonging to a decedent which had any value so as to be utilized in paying debts may be regarded as assets for the purpose of granting administration. The question of the existence of such asset is seldom difficult, but the question where it may be regarded as located may often become so. In settling this question the common-law rules are generally followed.

In Atty-Gen. v. Bouwens, 4 Mees. & W. 191, the court in considering the liability to probate duty, said "as to the locality of many descriptions of effects, household and movable goods for instance, there never could be any dispute; but to prevent conflicting jurisdictions between different ordinaries with respect to choses in action and titles to property it was established as law that judgment debts were assets where the judgment is recorded; 24 L. R. A.

leases where the land lies; specialty debts where the instrument happens to be; and simple contract debts where the debtor resides at the time of the testator's death; and it was also decided that, as bills of exchange and promissory notes do not alter the nature of simple contract debts but are merely evidence of the debts due, those instruments are assets where the debtor lives and not where the instruments are found.

The presence of assets is not necessary to the appointment of an administrator at the place of decedent's domicile at the time of his decease. Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. v. Reeves, (Ind.) Nov. 2, 1893.

In Putnam v. Pitney, 11 L. R. A. 41, 45 Minn. 242, it appeared that there was a Minnesota debtor to the New Jersey deceased debtor of a Maine creditor. The Maine creditor applied to the Minnesota courts for administration to assist him in collecting his demand, but the court said that it was better for the whole estate to be settled by the one administrator who had been appointed in New Jersey, and that so far as foreign creditors were concerned, Minnesota courts would not, by reason of the debt, appoint administration adverse to that of the New Jersey administrator.

Simple contract debts.

A debt owing to decedent is estate authorizing the appointment of administration. Emery v. Hilbreth, 2 Gray, 228.

A statute permitting administration, if any goods are found within the state, will include choses in action and evidence of debt. Epping v. Robinson, 21 Fla. 38.

In Picquet, Appellant, 5 Pick. 65, administration was granted to collect a debt.

The claim against an administrator who, knowing of a paper purporting to be a will of the alleged intestate, distributes the property to the on the report of a referee in a proceeding brought to compel payment for services rendered in the prosecution of Alabama claims. Judgment reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mears, Stewart & Wilds, for defendant:

The plaintiff's lien was barred by section 18 of the Act of 1874.

The Act of 1882 provided "that the court of commissioners of Alabama claims created by chapter 459 of the Laws of the 43d Congress is hereby re-established, in the manner and with the obligations, duties and powers imposed and conferred by said chapter, except as changed or modified by this Act."

In no adjudicated case has the efficacy of the statute to defeat liens been assailed.

See Bachman v. Lawson, 109 U. S. 659, 27 L. ed. 1067; Brooks v. Ahrens, 68 Md. 212.

The plaintiff's lien was barred by section 3477 of U. S. Rev. Stat.

Burke v. Child, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 441, 22 L. ed. 623; Wright v. Tebbitts, 91 U. S. 252, 23 L. ed. 320; Becker v. Sretzer, 15 Minn. 427; United States v. Gillis, 95 U. S. 407, 24 L. ed. 508.

Although it has been held in several cases, notably Brooks v. Ahrens, supra, and Taft v. Marnely, 120 N. Y. 474, and by a divided court in Heard v. Sturgis, 146 Mass. 545, that the money paid under this Act of 1882 constituted a gift and did not pass to the assignee under a previous assignment in bankruptcy, yet there can be no doubt that after the Act of 1882 went into effect, the claim by force of the Act then became such a claim against the government, as is contemplated in § 3477.

An attorney of record in the court of claims has no lien on the judgment.

Brookes' Case, 12 Ops. Atty-Gen. 216.

The defendant was not affected with notice of the alleged lien and cannot be held to respond out of his own funds to the plaintiff.

The great indulgence shown by courts to the attorney's charging lien upon judgments has never gone to the extent of charging the judgment debtor who, without notice of the lien, and without collusion, pays the judgment to the judgment creditor.

1 Jones, Liens, § 209; Welsh v. Hole, 1 Dougl. 238; Read v. Dupper, 6 T. R. 361; Mitchell v. Oldfield, 4 T. R. 123; Marshall v. Meech, 51 N. Y. 140, 10 Am. Rep. 572; Pinder v. Morris, 3 Cal. 165; Heartt v. Chipman, 2 Aik. 162; Hooper v. Welch, 43 Vt. 169, 5 Am. Rep. 267; Young v. Dearborn, 27 N. H. 324; Courtney v. McGavock, 23 Wis. 619.

The obvious import of the plaintiff's undertaking was to prosecute these several claims to judgment. If then, judgment was obtained by him, to have one half of the amount recovered.

If he had renounced his employer's service, without cause, before the judgment was obtained, could he have maintained a lien? Most certainly not, for he would have violated the contract upon the performance of which his lien depended.

How, then, does he stand in any better light, having by his own fault placed himself where he could no longer act as his client's attorney in that court?

next of kin, is sufficient to justify granting of letters of administration with the will annexed. Re Nesmith, 1 N. Y. Supp. 342.

Viners Abridgment, Executor H. says it seems it is not law that a debt without specialty shall be counted bona where the debtor dwells and not where the testator dwelt.

But that statement cannot now be regarded as true.

In England to found the jurisdiction of the prerogative court there must be bona notabilia, and for this purpose simple contract debts were bona notabilia at the place where the debtor resides. France v. Aubrey, 2 Lea, Eocl. Rep. 684.

There is a dictum in Wyman v. United States, 109 U. S. 654, 27 L. ed. 1068, that all simple contract debts are assets at the domicile of the debtor, to which several authorities are cited.

In considering the question of the power of the administrator to release it, the court in Chapman v. Fish, 6 Hill, 554, said "a simple contract debt would be bona notabilia in the state where the debtor lived."

In a case where the question was as to what law should govern in the distribution of some notes and bonds which had been deposited with an agent for safe keeping, the court said at common law for the purpose of administration a simple contract debt is assets where the debtor resides. Cooper v. Beers, 143 Ill. 26.

And a similar rule was recognized in the following cases: Sayre v. Helme, 61 Pa. 299; Kohler v. Knapp, 1 Bradf. 241; Arnold v. Arnold, 62 Ga. 627; Vaughn v. Barret, 5 Vt. 333, 26 Am. Dec. 306.

Where a debt must be demanded and paid or prosecuted, is where administration must be taken out. Com. v. Hudgin, 2 Leigh, 248.

The Tennessee Code, section 3043, provides that letters of administration may be granted where a 24 L. R. A.

debtor of deceased resides; where a debtor of another debtor of the deceased resides; where a suit is to be brought, prosecuted, or defended in which such estate is interested.

Interest in pending suit.

An interest in an action at law is assets. Murphy v. Creighton, 45 Iowa, 179.

A bond in suit at the death of the intestate will support administration. Barclift v. Treece, 77 Ala. 523.

A claim for which a removed executor was prosecuting an action will authorize the appointment of an administrator with the will annexed. Hayward v. Place, 4 Dem. 487.

A pending suit to enjoin an action at law and for an account is within a statute permitting the appointment of an administrator for goods, and the fact that the suit is finally decided against the administrator will not destroy the original jurisdiction to appoint the administrator so as to make the proceeding void and relieve the sureties from liability. Robinson v. Epping, 24 Fla. 237.

A right of action for negligent injuries causing death is assets. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Lewis, 3 L. R. A. 87, 24 Neb. 848.

Administration for the purpose of enforcing the statutory liability for killing the intestate is a matter of right. Hartford, & N. H. R. Co. v. Andrews, 36 Conn. 214.

But a statutory right of action for death in one state will not give jurisdiction to grant administration in another. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Cragin, 71 Ill. 177.

But in Swaney v. Scott, 9 Humph. 327, the court held that in case a judgment was recovered in a foreign state and then the creditor died and the debtor removed to the state of the application, administration could be granted to recover the claim.

Munson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The tribunal of arbitration which met at Geneva, in Switzerland, under the provisions of the treaty of Washington, for the adjustment of the claims of the United States against Great Britain, known as the "Alabama Claims," awarded to the United States a certain sum, in gross, in satisfaction of its demands. In 1874 the court of commissioners of Alabama claims was established, by act of congress, to effect a distribution of the sum so awarded; but, after the satisfaction of all claims which the court was authorized to allow, a portion of the award remained undistributed, and was covered into the treasury of the United States. In 1892 this court was re-established for the allowance of claims directly resulting from damage done on the high

Two New York cases appear to conflict on this question. One holds that a claim against an insurance company is assets where the insurer is located, although the policy is in another state. Re Miller, 5 Dem. 381.

The other holds that the interest of decedent in a policy of insurance issued for his benefit on the life of another is assets where the policy is found. Johnston v. Smith, 25 Hun, 171.

Claims against government.

Under the Act of Congress of 1821, giving executors from other states the right to sue in the District of Columbia, no administration could be appointed there to receive a claim due decedent from the government so long as there was an executor having authority from the state where the decedent was domiciled at the time of his death. Kane v. Paul, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 83, 10 L. ed. 341.

The mere fact that the United States has given drafts payable at the treasury in Washington and has deposited the money there to pay them does not compel administration there to collect them, but the proper officers may in their discretion pay the administrator of the domicile, and mandamus will not lie to control such discretion. Wyman v. United States, 109 U. S. 654, 27 L. ed. 1068.

A claim against the United States is not a local asset in the District of Columbia which will give jurisdiction for administration of an estate of a person domiciled elsewhere. King v. United States, 27 Ct. Cl. 829; Rutherford v. United States, Id. 539.

Where the sole asset was an indebtedness of the state, any ordinary within the state could grant administration. Ex parte Dauthereau, 2 Brev. 459.

But the Irish court refused to grant administration upon the estate of an Irish officer who died in India leaving property there and a sum of money seas by confederate cruisers, and claims for the payment of premiums charged for war risks after the sailing of any confederate cruiser; and provision was made for the payment of the claims so allowed, by the secretary of the treasury, out of the balance of the Geneva award not appropriated to claims allowed under the previous act. This suit is to recover for services rendered in the prosecution of claims of the second class above named before the court of commissioners, as thus re-established.

Soon after the passage of the Act of 1882 the plaintiff undertook to prosecute the demands of certain complainants under contracts by which he was to have one half of the amount recovered and collected, and was to make no charge unless recovery was had. These demands were based upon payments made by the complainants as agents of certain beneficiaries, who had afterwards reimbursed such complainants for the sums advanced. While these claims were pending the court promulgated a construction of the statute under which they were presented, to the effect that when payment of premiums had been made by one party in his own name for the benefit of others, and the amount of such payment had been refunded to him by the persons for whose benefit the payment was made, the petition should be made out and sworn to in the name of the party who paid the premiums, on behalf of the persons for whose benefit such payment was made, and should state the names and residences of the parties beneficially interested, and the amount of their respective interests, and that separate judgments should be entered in favor of such beneficiaries. After this was promulgated the petitions in the cases in which the plaintiff rendered the services sued for were amended accordingly. The plaintiff subsequently continued the prosecution of the claims under such circumstances regarding employment by the beneficiaries as will be hereafter stated. Previous to the 15th day of July, 1885, the proofs were completed, and the claims ready for judgment as the petitions then stood. On that day the court announced a further decision, to the effect that, where the claimant's administrator received his appointment without the United States, ancillary administration must be taken out in the District of Columbia, and that the ancillary administrator, only, could maintain the claim of the decedent, and take judgment thereon. It was also held that a judgment could not be rendered in favor of a guardian. On the 29th day of July, 1885, and before any further action had been taken by the plaintiff upon the claims in question in view of these decisions, the plaintiff was prohibited from appearing in the court of commissioners, and from exercising in any way the functions of an attorney and counselor of that court; and the clerk was authorized to substitute for the plaintiff's name the name of any other attorney, upon the receipt of a written request to that effect from the claimant or his legal representative. The plaintiff did not appear in court after this, and rendered no further services in connection with the claims; but he entered into an arrangement with one Edward E.

Administration may be granted on property brought into the state after the intestate's death. Robinson v. Robinson, 11 Ala. 947; Miller v. Jones, 25 Ala. 247; Kohler v. Knapp, 1 Bradf. 241.

A debt due by one who comes into the state after the creditor's death will authorize administration on the estate of the creditor. Pinney v. McGregory, 102 Mass. 186.

If the debtor of an estate removes within a state where there are claims against the decedent, an administrator may be appointed to collect the debts and pay the claims. Stearns v. Wright, 51 N. H. 800.

Proof of will may be taken, if, since testator's death, a promissory note secured by a mortgage on land in another state has come within the jurisdiction. Re Hopper, 5 Dem. 242.

But property temporarily brought into the jurisdiction for a special purpose does not confer jurisdiction. Christy v. Vest, 38 Iowa, 287.

So an article temporarily brought into the jurisdiction after the death of the intestate on a bailment, but removed before application for administration, is not assets. Kohler v. Knapp, supra.

And in Kentucky it is held that property brought into the country after the decease will not give jurisdiction. Embry v. Millar, 1 A. K. Marsh. 800, 10 Am. Dec. 732.

In Burnett v. Meadows, 7 B. Mon. 277, 46 Am. Dec. 517, it was held that property owned by one who died in transitu between the state of his former residence and that to which he was intending to remove might be considered assets in the latter state 24 L. R. A.

if the family continued the journey and finally settled in the land of adoption.

Lands.

Real estate may be assets. Bishop v. Lalouette, 67 Ala. 197; Sprayberry v. Culbertson, 32 Ga. 299; Littie v. Slinnett, 7 Iowa, 324; Lees v. Wetmore, 58 Iowa, 170; Prescott v. Durfee, 131 Mass. 477; Hart v. Coltrain, 19 Wend. 378.

In the latter case, however, it is said that under the statute the jurisdiction did not turn upon the question of assets.

And to make lands assets, it is probable that they must be necessary to pay debts. Ives v. Jacksonville Nat. Bank, 23 Ill. App. 563.

In Floyd v. Pilgrim, 32 Wis. 378, it is suggested that if there is no personality and no debts, no administration could be granted for real estate.

And a similar suggestion was made in Filbey v. Carrier, 45 Wis. 469.

In Fay v. Haven, 3 Met. 109, administration was granted where the only assets were lands.

Lands are assets if the owner died an alien and an administrator is needed to protect the estate and care for its proper disposition. Nicorsol v. Giuly, 85 Ala. 365.

In Temples v. Cain, 60 Miss. 473, real estate which was left by a resident was held to be assets, but this is, perhaps, not so when left by a nonresident. Partee v. Kortrecht, 54 Miss. 63.

In Kentucky, however, lands are not assets. Thumb v. Gresham, 2 Meta. (Ky.) 306; Rutherford v. Clark, 4 Bush, 27.

And under New York Rev. Stat. lands are not assets which will warrant the granting of administration. Hollister v. Hollister, 10 How. Pr. 532.

An allegation of fraudulent transfer by decedent of his real estate will authorize administration. Bowdoin v. Holland, 10 Cush. 17.

Holman, who was then a clerk in his office, by which it was agreed that Holman should procure an appointment in the orphans' court of the District, as ancillary administrator of the several beneficiaries, and appear in the several cases in the interest of the plaintiff, and take judgment upon the several claims, and receive from the plaintiff for these services a certain share of the amounts collected. Before anything had been done under this agreement, Holman abandoned his employment as the plaintiff's clerk, and commenced practice for himself; and he thereupon procured the defendant to take out the administration made necessary by the above decision. After duly qualifying under his appointments as administrator, the defendant employed Holman to appear in the several cases and obtain judgment. Holman was regularly substituted in place of the plaintiff as attorney, and prosecuted the claims in behalf of the defendant. But no further proofs were furnished, except the depositions of the defendant, in which he referred to the proofs already on file, and expressed his willingness to accept as correct the amounts therein named. Judgments were obtained in due course, of which the defendant received part satisfaction.

The beneficiaries whose claims were thus preferred for allowance by the plaintiff, and of whose estates the defendant was thus appointed administrator, with the exception of Henry W. Slicer, died in foreign countries, and left estates which were there administered. In some of the cases the entire service of the plaintiff is shown to have been rendered after the death of the beneficiary; and this is apparently true of all the cases, except that in the Case of Raynsford the initiatory proceedings were before his death. In some of the cases the plaintiff was directly employed, or clearly recognized, by the personal representative of the beneficiary in the country of principal administration, as attorney for the further prosecution of the claim; but no adoption of the contract made with the complainant is shown in any case. Slicer died in Baltimore, Md., leaving minor children, of whom Laura G. Cooper was the duly appointed guardian. The amendment and subsequent prosecution of the petition by the plaintiff was done as her attorney. Raynsford died at Rio Janeiro, in Brazil, leaving a widow, who was there duly appointed his administratrix. She furnished such further proofs as the plaintiff called for. Grossman died in the kingdom of Prussia, leaving a widow, who was appointed his executrix, and who continued the plaintiff as her attorney. Miguel Bou died in Barcelona, in Spain; and the petition in his case was further prosecuted in the name of his son, as executor, who recognized the plaintiff as attorney for the complainant, and appointed an agent to protect the beneficiary's interest. Zangroniz was a member of the firm of Y. M. Zangroniz & Co.; the other partners being Baron Kessel and Sebastian de Lassa, residents of Cuba. One Kerlegand, of Havana, was appointed executor, etc., of the estate of Zangroniz, and recognized the plaintiff as his attorney in the prosecution of the decedent's claim. But no judgment was rendered in favor of the Zangroniz estate, the judgment upon this claim being awarded to Kessel and De Lassa, as surviving partners, but without any such judgment being asked by them, or by any representative or attorney in their behalf. Cosme de la Torricute died in Cuba, and one Rionda was duly appointed administrator of his estate, and as such agreed that the plaintiff should receive for his services 60 per cent of any judgment obtained, and should have a lien upon any draft which might be issued in payment of such judgment, and be the lawful custodian of such draft until the amount due him should be paid. The defendant has settled his several administration accounts, and with the exception of the amounts received on

The reversion after the death of the widow will authorize the appointment of an administrator de bonis non. Bancroft v. Andrews, 6 Cush. 494.

Rents of real estate accruing and collected subsequently to the decedent's death are not assets. Kohler v. Knapp, 1 Bradf. 241.

Deposits.

United States bonds deposited upon a special certificate of deposit for their safe keeping are not assets at the place of deposit so as to prevent their being taken possession of by the foreign executor and require the appointment of a local administrator. Shakespeare v. Fidelity Ins. Trust S. D. Co. 97 Pa. 173.

Doubtful claims.

The mere fact that a claim may be doubtful is, it seems, immaterial. The question of the validity of the claim is not for the probate court to decide.

A claim against one with whom the decedent had deposited money is assets, and it is immaterial that the claim may prove to be invalid or incapable of enforcement. Sullivan v. Fosdick, 10 Hun. 173.

A note may constitute assets, although it is secured by a mortgage on land which is claimed by a third person by adverse possession, since the probate court cannot determine the validity of such claim, but must leave its decision to the courts of law. Parsons v. Spaulding, 120 Mass. 33.

Claim against personal representatives.

An attempt to assert a right against the personal representative will not give jurisdiction to appoint an administrator. Fatillo v. Barkdale, 23 Ga. 354.

After claims have been collected by an executor in a foreign country and remitted for distribution, they cease to be assets so as to permit administration in the state of their destination. Sedgwick v. Ashburner, 1 Bradf. 105.

Money sent by foreign administrators to their agent in this country to be paid over to the legatees is not assets in his hands which will authorize the appointment of an administrator at the instance of creditors of the decedent residing here. Wheelock v. Pierce, 6 Cush. 233.

In Warner v. Bevil, 17 Ala. 233, it is said that an orphan's court has no jurisdiction of personality which, after the death of the testator, the executor removed from the place of the testator's residence into the territorial jurisdiction of such court.

Bills and notes.

In Tennessee the court adopted a rule on this question at variance with the rule at common law as stated above, and held that bills and notes are assets where they are found and not where the debtor resides. St. John v. Hodges, 9 Baxt. 384.

the Zangroniz claim, and in the Slicer estate, has paid over the sums received, less the expenses allowed, to the personal representatives of the several decedents in the foreign countries named.

The plaintiff sought to establish before the referee an express promise by the defendant to pay for these services. The referee having failed to find that any promise was made, the plaintiff now claims that the circumstances were such that the law will imply one. This claim must rest upon one of two grounds,—either that the defendant has received and disposed of a fund upon which the plaintiff had a lien, and out of which it was the duty of the defendant to see that the plaintiff was paid, or that the defendant has received the benefit of the plaintiff's services under such circumstances that the law casts upon him the burden of compensation. But the defendant suggests that the plaintiff's only remedy, upon a claim of this nature, was in the court where the defendant accounted for the estates. The case shows that, to establish a claim against a deceased person's estate in the District of Columbia, the claim must be filed with the register of wills within 18 months after the issue of letters of administration; that the notice required by law to be given to creditors in such cases was duly given by the defendant; but that the plaintiff did not, within the period named, file any claims against these estates. Ordinarily the persons referred to as creditors of an estate are those who had claims against the deceased in his lifetime; and the requirements concerning the presentation of claims ordinarily refers to demands of this character, and not to such liabilities as may have been incurred by the administrator in the settlement of the estate. Without more definite findings as to the probate procedure in the District of Columbia, we should hesitate to reject any claim which the plaintiff may have obtained against the administrator, as barred by the settlement of the estate. It will therefore be necessary to consider the grounds of the plaintiff's claim.

The plaintiff claims to have had an attorney's lien upon the money recovered by the defendant; and the defendant insists that any right of this kind, which the plaintiff might otherwise have had, was barred, both by the provisions of the act constituting the court, and by the Revised Statutes of the United States. By the Act of 1874 it was provided that the court should, upon motion, allow the compensation of attorneys, and enter the same as a part of its judgment, and that all other liens upon the judgment should be of no effect. The Act of 1882 re-established the court, with its former obligations, duties, and powers; directed that the practice and proceedings established by the former act should be followed; and authorized the rendition of judgments in the mode, and subject to the conditions, limitations, and provisions, of that act. This seems clearly to revive the provisions of the Act of 1874, above recited. It has been so held in Maryland. Brooks v. Ahrens, 68 Md. 212. And those provisions being in force, an attorney's lien could not be acquired. Bachman v. Lawson, 109 U. S. 659, 27 L. ed. 1067.

The plaintiff's right to assert a lien seems, also, to be inconsistent within section 3477 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as construed by the United States Supreme Court. It is provided by that section that all transfers and assignments of any claim upon the United States, or of any interest therein, shall be absolutely null and void, unless made with certain formalities, and after the allowance of the claim, and the issuing of a warrant therefor. In several cases involving the claims of agents and attorneys for compensation for services rendered in establishing claims, this provision has been treated as inconsistent with the existence of any lien upon the sum recovered. Trist v. Child, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 441, 22 L. ed. 633; Wright v. Tobbitts, 91 U. S. 252, 23 L. ed. 320. In Spofford v. Kirk, 97 U. S. 484, 24 L. ed. 1032, the court held that an assignment of an interest in a pending claim was a nullity, as between assignor and assignee, and said of this section, "it strikes at every derivative interest, in whatever form acquired." The limitations since placed upon the language quoted do not touch the decision itself, as an authority against the enforcement of liens. Bailey v. United States, 109 U. S. 432, 27 L. ed. 988. In United States v. Gillis, 95 U. S. 407, 24 L. ed. 508, where it was sought to restrict the application of this section, it was said to cover "all claims against the United States, in any tribunal in which they may be asserted."

But the plaintiff insists that these claims are not "claims against the United States," within the meaning of the statute or the decisions, but are merely demands which the claimants are permitted to prosecute against a special fund. It is true that the judgments recovered are to be satisfied out of a particular fund, and that the United States assumes no responsibility beyond this. But the money had been covered into the treasury of the United States, and the right to it was to be established by legal proceedings. Whatever the relation of these parties to the United States may have been before the Act of 1882 was passed, it is certain that by that act they were placed upon the footing of persons having a right to establish claims against the United States. In Hobbs v. McLean, 117 U. S. 575, 29 L. ed. 948, a claim against the United States is defined to be "a right to demand money from the United States." We think the claims in question were claims against the United States, within the meaning of the law, and so within the scope of the section referred to.

But, if the plaintiff was entitled to assert a lien, it does not follow that defendant is liable for having paid over these judgments without satisfying it. The report contains nothing to charge the defendant with a knowledge of the plaintiff's claim upon the funds transmitted. The defendant knew that the plaintiff had rendered these services, but had no knowledge of the terms upon which they were rendered, and supposed that the plaintiff's claim for compensation was against the person who had employed him. He knew that the plaintiff had been precluded from practicing in the court of commissioners, but had no knowledge that Holman had agreed to prosecute the claims in his interest, and supposed that the cases could be taken up by any attorney who might be employed to do so. We do not see how the defendant could be held liable by reason of the existence of a lien, unless he knew, or should have known, that one was claimed. An attorney's lien is either a retaining lien or a charging lien. A retaining lien is based upon the possession of money or papers, and expires when the possession ends. A charging lien is the right to make the claim for compensation a charge upon the judgment, and this is not perfected until notice is given to the defendant. Huilebert v. Brigham, 56 Vt. 868; Weed Sewing-Mach. Co. v. Boutelle, Id. 570. The usual assertion of a charging lien would have occurred if this plaintiff had given notice of a lien to the United States, in order to prevent the payment of a judgment to this defendant, and make the United States liable if the judgment should be paid in disregard of the notice. If the money is suffered to reach the one who recovers it, the question, as regards him, is ordinarily reduced to one of personal liability. Here, the money has come into the hands of the defendant, the plaintiff in the suits in which the judgments were recovered, who in ordinary course would have been the plaintiff's client; and, the money so received having been disbursed in due course of administration, the plaintiff now seeks to charge the defendant with the payment of his claim, on the ground that he had a lien on the funds thus recovered and disbursed. The effort is to impose a lien upon the funds in the hands of the recovering party, and through the lien a personal responsibility, where otherwise none would have existed. If other conditions permitted, this certainly could not be accomplished without notice; and the mere knowledge that a former attorney had rendered services in connection with the claims did not constitute notice. Upon the findings of the referee, we cannot say that the circumstances were such as to put the defendant on inquiry, and charge him with knowledge of a lien; and, there being no notice of a lien, the defendant could safely assume that the plaintiff had had his pay, or that he relied upon the personal responsibility of his employers.

It is true that the funds realized from the Slicer and Zangroniz claims are still in the hands of the defendant. But the views before stated, as to the right of the plaintiff to assert a lien, leave no ground upon which this fact can entitle the plaintiff to a judgment for any part of the compensation claimed. If it should seem that the defendant's possession of this money ought to avail the plaintiff in some way, it must be remembered that this is not a proceeding to reach and control the fund in satisfaction of a lien, but a suit to establish a personal liability for the payment of the claim. If the defendant could have been held liable, on account of the other cases, in a suit of this character, brought while the money was still in hand, special difficulties might be found in the way of recovery on account of these two. The plaintiff's services in the Slicer Case were rendered upon the employment of the guardian of the heirs, and judgment was obtained by the defendant as administrator of Slicer's estate. The Zangroniz claim was prosecuted by the plaintiff for the foreign executor of Zangroniz, while the fund is held by the defendant as administrator of the estates of Kesael and De Lassa.

It remains to consider whether the defendant has taken the benefit of services rendered by the plaintiff under such circumstances that he should be, and can be, compelled to pay for them. Did the use of the proofs filed by the plaintiff, in the circumstances stated, fasten upon the defendant a legal obligation to compensate the plaintiff? It is true that the law will sometimes imply from circumstances a request to render services when no actual request was made, and a promise to pay for them where no such promise was expressed; and this without there having been any intention between the parties to enter into a contract. Jess v. Huile, 12 Vt. 814, 827; Paddock v. Kittredge, 81 Vt. 878, 384. But it is difficult to see how the plaintiff in this case can recover on the ground of an implied undertaking on the part of the defendant to pay for his services. At the time the plaintiff rendered the services, the defendant was an absolute stranger to the proceedings, and to every interest involved in them. When the defendant became connected with the proceedings, the proofs were in the files of the court, and entirely beyond the control of the plaintiff. The defendant had no communication with the plaintiff in regard to these proceedings, and received from him nothing pertaining to them. He entered upon the trust to meet a requirement of the court, and took charge of the cases with its full approval. He did not know that the plaintiff had made an arrangement with Holman, and was relying upon him to act in his interest. We find nothing in the case upon which the law can raise an implied promise. The procurement of judgments upon proofs provided at the expense of the plaintiff, and receiving what appears to have been sufficient compensation for the entire business, while ignoring the plaintiff's claim, certainly presents an inequitable feature, which appeals to the careful consideration of the court. But the apparent inequity of this proceeding is somewhat modified by other features of the case. True, the plaintiff's right to pursue employers in foreign countries, if he is in a position to assert that right, can hardly be considered a substantial remedy, in view of the nature and size of the demands. But the law under which the claims were presented seems to have provided a method by which the plaintiff could have had any proper claim for compensation allowed by the court, and made the basis of a judgment in his favor. He might have taken measures to charge the fund, or have proceeded against the estate, or against the defendant personally, during the year or more that elapsed between the recovery of the judgments and the making of the disbursements. The plaintiff's assertion that during this time he notified the defendant of his claim, and was promised payment, is not sustained by the referee.

But the plaintiff claims, further, that the orphans' court of the District of Columbia had no jurisdiction of the estates of these beneficiaries; that the entire proceedings in probate are void, and afford the defendant no protection; that he should be treated as an intermeddler, and held, to the extent of his receipts, for the payment of any just claim against the defendant's estate. If the proceedings of the court of the District of Columbia are entitled to the same credit that is required to be given to judicial proceedings in one of the states, they are nevertheless open to examination upon the question of jurisdiction. Story, Conf. L. § 689. Only two things are essential to the jurisdiction of a probate court,—the death of the person upon whose estate letters are granted, and domicile or assets within the District. 8 Redf. Wills, 121, note. It is not necessary to consider the difference in the nature of these requirements, as affecting the validity of an administration based upon the erroneous finding, nor the conflict of authority in regard to matters of presumption and record. By all the cases, if these two facts exist, and appear of record as judicially ascertained, the grant of administration is valid, however irregular the proceedings may have been. And, if these two matters properly appear of record, the administration is at least prima facie valid, and he who questions it must establish its invalidity. Fisher v. Bassett, 38 Am. Dec. 289, note. The plaintiff seeks to impeach the defendant's appointments on both of these grounds. It is said that the petitions for administration did not allege the death of the persons upon whose estates administration was asked, and that without an allegation the fact could not be proved. If the alleged defect sufficiently appeared, it could not be given the effect claimed. The jurisdiction of the court did not depend upon the formality of the petition, nor upon an adherence to any technical rule of procedure. The records of appointment, and the letters issued, would doubtless show that the appointments were upon the estates of persons ascertained to be deceased; but neither of these have been placed before us. The referee reports that the defendant was duly appointed administrator of certain beneficiaries, who throughout the report are referred to the persons deceased. It is evident that no question was made before the referee touching the jurisdictional requirement, under consideration, and that for this reason nothing more than the general finding above stated was asked for, or deemed necessary. A general finding of this character will sustain an administration, when nothing further is submitted to enable the court to judge of its legality.

The plaintiff further objects that this claim was not an asset upon which administration could be granted, and that consequently there was no estate within the jurisdiction. Passing the question whether the action of the orphans' court is conclusive upon this point, we think the obligation assumed by the United States was an asset in the jurisdiction where provision was made for its satisfaction. A debt due the deceased is property in the jurisdiction of the debtor. The right to prove a claim upon this fund, even if granted as a pure gratuity, must be treated as a demand against a debtor for the purpose of administration. The money could be obtained only by an administrator whom the tribunal charged with the distribution of the fund would recognize as having authority to sue in that jurisdiction.

Moreover, it has been held that a claim of this character will pass under the designation of "property," to an assignee in insolvency in proceedings subsequent to the Act of 1892. Goreley v. Butler, 147 Mass. 8. Doubtless these claims of the second class must be treated as having had no existence prior to the passage of that act. Taft v. Marsily, 120 N. Y. 474; Heard v. Sturges, 146 Mass. 54. But it is not necessary that the assets upon which administration is granted should have been within the jurisdiction at the time of the decease. The rule, as usually stated by text-writers, would seem to require this; but it is evident that an adherence to the rule as thus stated would sometimes exclude assets from administration. Certainly, a debtor would not be permitted to defeat the collection of his debt by moving from one jurisdiction to another after the death of the creditor. The subsequent creation of an obligation to be collected by the representative of the deceased presents the same necessity. The jurisdiction must exist in favor of the estate wherever legal proceedings are necessary to establish its right to property, and none but a local administrator can secure the recognition of the courts. Pinney v. McGregory, 103 Mass. 188.

It is further objected that, in the petitions upon which the defendant's letters were granted, the petitioner represented himself to be a creditor, and that it appears from the accounts submitted that he was not. If this were sufficient to determine that the representation was untrue, and that the administration was granted on the ground of that representation, and not of other representations which the petitions may have contained, the objection could not avail the plaintiff. The matter does not touch the question of jurisdiction. Neither the residence of a creditor within the District, nor the application of one, if creditors there were, was essential to the validity of the proceedings. It was within the power of the court, in certain circumstances, to make an appointment not based upon kinship or interest. Schouler, Exrs. & Adms. § 115. If administration is granted in disregard of the preferences recognized by law, it may be revoked upon application of those whose rights have been ignored. Id. §§ 153, 153. True, the general rule is that foreign judgments may be impeached for fraud, as well as want of jurisdiction. It is said, however, that a grant of administration cannot be impeached for fraud in its procurement. 1 Woerner, Law of Administration, § 266. But the plaintiff insists that it may be, as against the administrator, if he be implicated in the fraud. It is to be noticed that the question, as presented here, touches only the priority of right to a necessary administration. In such a case we think it must at least be held that one who is entitled to interfere cannot stand by until the administration is completed, and then charge the administrator as if there had been no grant. The plaintiff knew that the defendant was administering upon these estates, and, if he claimed an interest that entitled him to the administration in place of the defendant, he should have asserted his right.

But the plaintiff insists that the foreign administrators were entitled to recognition, and that the court of commissioners could not lawfully render judgments in favor of an administrator appointed in the District. The foreign administrators certainly had no better standing than an administrator appointed in one of the states would have had. In Wyman v. United States, 109 U. S. 654, 27 L. ed. 1068, it is said that the United States may, in their discretion, exercised through their appropriate officers, pay a debt due the estate of a deceased person, either to the administrator appointed in the state of his domicile or to an ancillary administrator appointed in the District of Columbia. In Mackey v. Coxe, 9 U. S. 18 How. 100, 15 L. ed. 299, an administration in the District had been required by the treasury department as a prerequisite to the payment of a claim. The court said that the claim might have been paid, and indeed should have been paid, to the attorney in fact of the principal administrators, but did not speak of the ancillary administration otherwise than as one required through abundant caution. The court established to allow these claims having held that judgments could be obtained only by administrators appointed in the District, it is not important to consider whether some other course might properly have been taken.

It is true that an award of the court of commissioners is only a determination of the amount and validity of the claim, as against the United States, and precludes no one who claims to have been entitled to the allowance from asserting his right to the funds against the recovering party in other tribunals. Heard v. Sturgis, 146 Mass. 545. But if it could be held that the court of commissioners awarded these funds to one not entitled to receive them, the plaintiff could gain nothing by it, for he has no title to assert.

The defendant cannot be held liable to pay for the plaintiff's services on the ground that they were contracted for by the foreign administrators. The defendant's administration was ancillary, and independent of the administration in the country of domicile. There is no privity between principal and ancillary administrators. Story, Conf. L. § 522; Low v. Bartlett, 8 Allen, 259.

Judgment reversed, and judgment for defendant.

(61 Fed. Rep. 605.)

1. A railway company is not responsible for the acts of an engineer and fireman in running an engine which it has rented to a bridge company, used as a switch engine on a bridge used by several other railway companies, at a rental of $10 a day, besides payment of the expenses of running the engine and the wages of the engineer and fireman, who were carried on the pay-roll of the railway company.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Tennessee to review a judgment in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of the plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed in part; reversed in part.

Statement by Taft, Circuit Judge:

This was a writ of error from the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Tennessee, sued out by the plaintiff below, Francis J. Byrne, administrator of George Nason, deceased. The action was brought for the wrongful death of the plaintiff's intestate against the Kansas City, Ft. Scott & Memphis Railroad Company and the Kansas City & Memphis Railway & Bridge Company.

The amended declaration averred that plaintiff's intestate was run over and killed by a train of the defendant the Kansas City, Ft. Scott & Memphis Railroad Company, running on the track of the Kansas City & Memphis Railway & Bridge Company, at a place where it crosses Pennsylvania avenue, a street of the city of Memphis. That the death was caused by the negligence of the defendants in not keeping the crossing at Pennsylvania avenue in good repair, as the bridge company had agreed with the city of Memphis to do; in not keeping the bell of the engine constantly ringing while said engine was passing through the city; in not keeping a lookout ahead; in not sounding the alarm whistle; and in not putting down the brakes to stop the engine before Nason was struck,—all in violation of the laws of Tennessee. Further wrongful conduct was averred in that the engine did not come to a full stop before crossing the street railroad which was being operated on Pennsylvania avenue, in violation, as charged, of the statutes of the state.

The facts developed by the evidence were as follows: Pennsylvania avenue runs north and south. The bridge company owns a track of about two and one-half miles, connecting the bridge with the railways which run into Memphis. The track runs east and west, and crosses Pennsylvania avenue at right angles. From the east side of Pennsylvania avenue it curves rather abruptly to the south, the curve being about 10 feet in 100 from a straight line. The bridge company owns no engines of its own, but it rented the one in question from the Kansas City, Ft. Scott & Memphis Railroad Company. The accident occurred upon Sunday, June 26, 1892, about 6 o'clock in the evening, in broad daylight. The engine was running west, on business of the bridge company, with its tender in front. It was a switch engine, and, as is generally the case in such engines, the tender slopes downward towards the back. Coal had been piled up on the tender so as to somewhat obstruct the view of the engineer. There was a flagman at the Pennsylvania crossing at the time of the accident. Nason, the deceased, was a colored man, eighty-six years of age. A few minutes before the accident he had crossed the track, and entered into conversation with the flagman and a boy about twelve years of age, who was sitting there with the flagman. In the course of the conversation he expressed a desire to die; said that he was not happy, and that if he did die he could not be in a worse place than he was then. The flagman's house was at the southeast corner of the crossing. Nason, who lived in a house at the northwest corner of the crossing, about 80 feet from the track, started towards his home. There was a double railway track on the crossing. The engine was backing down on the north track. The flagman saw the engine, and put out his red signal, and then discovered Nason walking towards the track, and called out to him. So also did the young boy who was with the flagman. As the locomotive ran onto Pennsylvania avenue, Nason was on the south track. Without halting he walked onto the north track immediately in front of the engine. Before stepping on the track, he turned his head to look either at the engine or at those who were shouting at him. He was run down, and thrown some 20 or 30 feet beyond the west line of Pennsylvania avenue. Two witnesses of the plaintiff swear that they were sitting within 30 or 40 feet of the crossing, and that the engine bell did not ring. The engineer and the fireman upon the engine, and the flagman and the boy who was at the crossing, all swear that the bell did ring. The engineer testified that the whistle had been blown about a block away from the Pennsylvania crossing. The engine did not stop before it crossed the street car track. The engineer did not see the man until he was about to step upon the track, 10 feet away from the tender. He then reversed his engine, and did everything he could to stop, but was unable to prevent the accident. The trial judge first directed a verdict for the railway company on the ground that it was not responsible for the negligence of the engineer and fireman, because at the time of the accident they were rented with the engine to the bridge company. After full argument he also directed a verdict for the bridge company on the ground that, while the bridge company was negligent in certain respects, the accident was also due to the gross negligence of the deceased, which barred recovery.

Argued before Taft and Lurton, Circuit Judges, and Barr, District Judge.

Sections 1298, 1299, 1300, of Milliken & Vertrees' Code of Tennessee have no application to this case because there was not time after the deceased appeared on the road in front of the engine to comply with the statute or save his life.

The rule that where the defendant is guilty of negligence and the plaintiff also contributed to the misfortune by his negligence, yet the plaintiff can recover if it be shown that the defendant might, by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence, have avoided the consequences of plaintiff's negligence, is not applicable to this case, because there was no time after the plaintiff put himself in a perilous position, or after his peril was or could have been discovered by defendant, for the defendant to have done anything which would have averted the calamity.

Powell v. Virginia Constr. Co. 88 Tenn. 693, and authorities cited.

Petition for rehearing.

That the failure of the defendant railroad company to comply with sub-section 8 of section 1298 of Milliken & Vertess' Code of Tennessee, providing that "on leaving a town or city, the bell or whistle shall be sounded when the train starts, and at intervals until it has left corporate limits," would make the defendant liable, regardless of whether any relation of cause or effect existed between a failure to ring the bell and the collision.

This construction would be correct under the earlier statutes given by the supreme court of Tennessee.

In 1879, however, the case of East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Soales, 2 Lea, 688, came before the court.

The trial judge had charged the jury: "Under these provisions, above stated, the court instructs you that railroad companies must comply with them; that sub-section 4 above quoted is imperative upon the company; that it must be complied with and that when any person, animal, or other obstruction appears upon the defendant railroad and said requirements of the statute are not observed by the agents and servants of the company, said company would be responsible for all damages to the person or property occasioned by or resulting from any accident or collision that may occur, and that the company would not be exonerated by showing, in such cases, that a part of the requirements only of the statute was observed and complied with. The burden of proof is upon the defendants to show that all the requirements were observed and complied with. If they were not, and plaintiff's mare appeared upon the road and was killed or injured, defendants would be responsible."

The court said: "The charge is authorized by and pursues the language in the case of Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Thomas, 5 Heisk. 262, and Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Smith, 9 Heisk. 360."

The court further said: "We must so understand the legislature or hold that they must be responsible for all damages to private property resulting from an accident for which no blame can be attached to them, and which no human foresight, activity, or attention could have avoided."

The court then laid down the principle that the proper construction of the statute only required the engineer to do such acts as he had time to do tending to prevent the accident between the time of the appearance of the animal upon the track and the time when it was struck, overruling former cases which held that the only way the company could escape liability where an animal was struck was by showing that all the acts enumerated in the statute had been done even though the animal might have been run over and killed long before these could have been performed.

In East Tennessee & V. R. Co. v. Swaney, 5 Lea, 119, the question again came before the court in a suit for the death of a human being. It was attempted in that case to draw a distinction between liabilities growing out of the killing of stock and those growing out of injuries to persons, but the court ruled that "the rule of impossibility clearly applies to all cases of injury whether to persons or property," and held further that all the subsections of the statute must be construed as in pari materia.

The impossibility meant by the Tennessee court is the impossibility of preventing the accident by doing the acts specified. And whenever it is manifest that a compliance with the statute would not prevent the accident the Tennessee decisions hold that the defendant is not bound to comply.

Chesapeake, O. & S. W. R. Co. v. Foster, 88 Tenn. 671; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Howard, 90 Tenn. 144.

Taft, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question for our consideration is whether the contract by which the Kansas City Company rented its engine to the bridge company relieves it of responsibility for negligence in the operation of the engine while in the service of the bridge company. It appears from the statement of Nettleton, who was both the superintendent of the bridge company and of the terminals of the Kansas City Railroad Company at Memphis, that the bridge company rented the engine from the railway company at $10 a day, and also paid the railway company the expense of the fuel and supplies used in the running of the engine, and the wages of the engineer and fireman, who were carried on the pay rolls of the railway company. The bridge is used by several different railway companies. The switch engine pushes all trains over it, and thus gives assistance to the regular engines of the railway companies on the heavy grades of the approaches. The engineer and fireman were subject to the orders of Nettleton as superintendent of the bridge company. As he expressed it, the bridge company rented the crew, along with the engine, from the railway company.

On this state of facts we are clearly of the opinion that the court was right in holding that the railway company was not responsible for the acts of the engineer and fireman in running the engine which killed Nason. They were, it is true, general servants of the railway company, but at the time of the accident they were engaged in the work of the bridge company, were subject to the orders of the bridge company's officers, and in what they did or failed to do were acting for the bridge company. The question is one of agency. The result is determined by the answer to the further questions, Whose work was the servant doing? and, Under whose control was he doing it? The railway company had simply lent its general servants to become special or particular servants of the bridge company, had for the time parted with control over them, and was not responsible for their acts while in the service and under the control of their temporary master.

The latest authority in support of this conclusion is Donovan v. Laing, Wharton & Donovan Constr. Syndicate, Limited, a decision by the court of appeals of England, reported in [1893] 1 Q. B. 629. In that case the defendants contracted to lend to a firm, who were engaged in loading a ship at their wharf, a crane, with a man in charge of it. He received directions from the firm or their servants as to the working of the crane, and the defendants had no control in the matter. The plaintiff, who was a servant of the wharfingers, was struck by the crane, and injured, by reason of the negligence of the man in charge of it, and sued the defendants on the ground that the negligence was the act of their servant. It was held that, though the man in charge of the crane remained the general servant of the defendants, yet, as they had parted with the power of controlling him in the work in which he was engaged, they were not liable for his negligence while so employed. Judgments were delivered in this case by Lord Esher, Master of the Rolls, and Lindley and Bowen, Lord Justices.

Lord Esher said: "In this case the crane and the man to work it were lent by the defendants to Jones & Co. for a consideration, and to be used in the manner I have described. For some purposes, no doubt, the man was the servant of the defendants. Probably, if he had let the crane get out of order by his neglect, and, in consequence, any one was injured thereby, the defendants might be liable; but the accident in this case did not happen from that cause, but from the manner of working the crane. The man was bound to work the crane according to the orders, and under the entire and absolute control, of Jones & Co. That being so, whose servant was the man in charge of the crane as to the working of it? It is true that the defendants selected the man and paid his wages, and these are circumstances which, if nothing else intervened, would be strong to show that he was the servant of the defendants. So, indeed, he was as to a great many things; but as to the working of the crane he was no longer their servant, but bound to work under the orders of Jones & Co.; and if they saw the man misconducting himself in working the crane, or disobeying their orders, they would have a right to discharge him from that employment. This conclusion hardly requires authority, but there is authority for it, without going back to an earlier date, in the case of Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co., L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 205."

Lindley, Lord Justice, said: "The key to the whole case is that Jones & Co. were loading the ship, and not the defendants. The crane was being used for Jones & Co's purposes, and not for those of the defendants, and the former must, for that particular job, be considered as Wand's [the man in charge of the crane] masters."

Lord Justice Bowen said: "The law on the matter now before us seems to me to be perfectly clear. The question is not who procured the doing of the unlawful act, but depends on the doctrine of the liability of a master for the acts of his servant done in the course of his employment. We have only to consider in whose employment the man was at the time when the acts complained of were done in this sense; that by the employer is meant the persons who had a right at the moment to control the doing of the act. That was the test laid down by Crompton, J., nearly forty years ago in Sadler v. Henlock, 4 El. & Bl. 570, in the form of the question, 'Did the defendants retain the power of controlling the work?' Here the defendants certainly parted with some control over the man and the question arises whether they parted with the power of controlling the operation on which the man was engaged. There are two ways in which a contractor may employ his men and his machines. He may contract to do the work, and the end being prescribed, the means of arriving at it may be left to him; or he may contract in a different manner, and, not doing the work himself, may place his servants and plant under the control of another,—that is, he may lend them,—and in that case he does not retain control over the work. . . . In the present case the defendants parted for a time with control over the work of the man in charge of the crane, and their responsibility for his acts ceased for a time."

In Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co., supra, the defendants, the owners of the colliery, had begun to sink a pit or shaft, and had erected and employed men to drive a steam engine near its mouth. After doing some work on the shaft, they entered into an agreement with one Whittle to carry on the work for them; Whittle to find all the labor necessary, and the defendants to provide and place at his disposal and under his control the necessary engine power, ropes, etc., with the engineer, who was paid by the defendants. The plaintiff, who was one of the men employed and paid by Whittle, while working at the bottom of the shaft, was injured by the negligence of the engineer. It was held by the court of appeals, consisting of Chief Justice Cockburn, Lord Justice Mellish, and Baggallay and Bramwell, Justices of Appeal, that, though the engineer was the general servant of the defendants, 24 L. R. A.

yet, because he was under the orders and control of Whittle at the time of the accident, he was at that time the servant of Whittle, and not of the defendants, who were, therefore, not liable for his negligence.

The same view was taken by the supreme court of Tennessee in the case of Powell v. Virginia Constr. Co., 88 Tenn. 692, in which Judge Lurton delivered an elaborate opinion for the court. In that case the construction company undertook to build a railroad from Memphis to Jackson, and sublet to a subcontractor the laying of part of the track. The construction company agreed to furnish push cars, locomotive, flats, and engineer and fireman and one brakeman, to be used and controlled by the subcontractor in doing this work. The inference from the contract was that the engineer, fireman, and brakeman were to be paid by the construction company. The plaintiff was injured by reason of the negligence of the fireman furnished by the construction company in running the engine. It was held that in so doing the fireman, though paid by the construction company, was the servant of the subcontractor, and that the construction company could not be held liable for his negligence. Judge Lurton quotes with approval from Chief Justice Cockburn's judgment in Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co., this language:

"When one person lends his servant to another for a particular employment, the servant, for anything done in that particular employment, must be dealt with as the servant of the man to whom he is lent, although he remains the general servant of the person who lent him."

In Miller v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co., 76 Iowa, 655, a contractor agreed to lay defendant's track at the rate of a certain number of miles per month, defendant "to furnish the motive power and cars, and operate the construction trains." One of the contractor's employes was killed by the too rapid running of the construction train. It was held that the defendant railway company was not liable, because, from the nature and terms of the contract, it did not have control of the construction trains, though the trainmen were retained on its pay roll, and received their wages from it.

In New Orleans, B. R. V. & M. R. Co. v. Norwood, 63 Miss. 565, 52 Am. Rep. 191, a different view of the law was taken. There a railroad company employed M., a contractor, to do certain work upon its road, and paid him therefor a stipulated price, and furnished him a construction train, and engineer to run the same. Subject to certain regulations as to speed, the control, management, and direction of the construction train was given wholly to the contractor. The engineer was selected by the company, and it alone had the right to discharge him, though bound to do so upon the complaint of M., and to supply his place. The company paid the engineer's wages, and charged the same to M., and deducted the amount thereof from the sum due him for his work. The railroad company was held liable to the owner of a mule killed by the negligent running of the construction train. The conclusion of the court was made to rest on what are known as the Carriage Cases.—Laughter v. Pointer, 5 Barn. & C. 547, and Quarman v. Burnett, 6 Mees. & W. 499. The supreme court of Texas in Burton v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co., 61 Tex. 526, reached the same conclusion on the same authorities. These Carriage Cases were clearly distinguished from the case at bar and like cases by Lord Justice Bowen in Dorosan v. Laing, Wharton & Down Constr. Syndicate, supra, in the following language: "The principal part of the argument for the plaintiff was founded on what may be called the Carriage Cases,—Laugher v. Pointer, and Quarman v. Burnett,—but they really have nothing to do with the point presented in this appeal. If a man lets out a carriage on hire to another, he in no sense places the coachman under the control of the hirer, except that the latter may indicate the destination to which he wishes to be driven. The coachman does not become the servant of the person he is driving, and, if the coachman acts wrongfully, the hirer can only complain to the owner of the carriage. If the hirer actively interferes with the driving, and an injury occurs to any one, the hirer may be liable, not as the master, but as the procurer and cause of the wrongful act complained of. In the present case the defendants parted for a time with control over the work of the man in charge of the crane and their responsibility for his acts ceased for the time."

This explanation of the Carriage Cases is also clearly stated by Mr. Justice Field in Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 372, 380, 29 L. ed. 652, 654, 657. It is manifest, therefore, that they have no application whenever it appears that the master has parted to another for a time with control over his servant, to be used in the work of that other.

We think that the weight of reason and authority is in favor of the ruling of the learned judge below, and the judgment for the Kansas City, Ft. Scott & Memphis Railroad Company is affirmed.

The second question is whether the bridge company was obliged to stop its engine before crossing the street-railway track upon Pennsylvania avenue, under section 1804 of the Code of Tennessee. That section provides that every engine or train shall be brought to a full stop before crossing a railroad which intersects the road upon which it runs. If a stop was required by the statute in this case, it might be argued that the deceased had the right to rely on its doing so; and therefore that he was not negligent in crossing the track without looking for a train or locomotive, or, at least, that the question was one for the jury. The court below was of the opinion that section 1804 did require the engine to stop before crossing a street railway. We are unable to concur in this view. The evidence is that this was a street railway, from which we infer, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that it was a horse railway. It has been decided by the supreme court of Tennessee in Katzenberger v. Lawo, 90 Tenn. 385, 18 L. R. A. 185, that: "A dummy line, over which trains are drawn by a small steam engine for transportation of passengers only, whether operated within or without the limits of a municipality, is a railroad, within the meaning of the statutes prescribing certain precautions for prevention of accidents on railroads."

And it was held that it did not affect the application of those statutes that the dummy was running longitudinally upon the streets of the city, for the very cogent reason that under such circumstances the danger of accidents is obviously increased. The decision just cited was based upon that in the case of East End Street R. Co. v. Doyle, 88 Tenn. 747, 9 L. R. A. 100, in which it was held that a dummy railroad, constructed by authority upon a public road or street, and operated for the transportation of passengers only, by means of a steam engine and coaches, constituted an additional burden upon the ultimate fee in the road or street, for which the owner of that fee was entitled to compensation as to the taking of his property for a public use. In the latter case the supreme court of the state expressly distinguish between a dummy railroad operated by steam and an ordinary street railroad, the motive power of which is horses, and classify the dummy railroad with commercial railways, and differentiate it from an ordinary horse car line. It follows therefore that the statute of Tennessee, which requires that the trains on one railway shall come to a full stop before crossing the line of another railway, has no application to the crossing by a steam commercial railway of an ordinary horse-car line.

The third question in the case is whether there was such contributory negligence on the part of the deceased as to bar his recovery in this action. We fully concur with the learned trial judge in the view that there was conclusive evidence of the grossest negligence on Nason's part, by reason of which he stepped to his death. Indeed, there are some circumstances tending to show that his death was voluntary, but they are not of that conclusive character which would justify a court in predicating a peremptory charge thereon. Were this a suit for common-law negligence alone, there is no doubt that the action of the court in taking this case from the jury and directing a verdict for the bridge company would have to be affirmed. But the difficulty in the case arises from certain statutory requirements affecting the operation of railways in Tennessee, the construction of which, by the supreme court of that state, gives them a peculiar effect in actions for damages for personal injury. Those statutes are contained in sections 1298 et seq. of Milliken & Vertrees' Code.

Section 1298: "In order to prevent accidents upon railroads, the following precautions shall be observed:

"1st. The overseers of every public road, crossed by a railroad, shall place at each crossing a sign marked: 'Look out for the cars when you hear the whistle or bell,' and the county court shall appropriate money to defray the expenses of said signs; and no engine driver shall be compelled to blow the whistle or ring the bell at any crossing unless it is so designated.

"2d. On approaching every crossing so distinguished the whistle or bell of the locomotive shall be sounded at the distance of one fourth of a mile from the crossing, and at short intervals, till the train has passed the crossing.

"3rd. On approaching a city or town, the bell or whistle shall be sounded when the train is at the distance of one mile, and at short intervals till it reaches its depot or station; and on leaving a town or city, the bell or whistle shall be sounded when the train starts and at intervals till it has left the corporate limits.

"4th. Every railroad company shall keep the engineer, fireman or some other person upon the locomotive always upon the lookout ahead; and when any person, animal, or other obstruction appears upon the road, the alarm whistle shall be sounded, the brakes put down and every possible means employed to stop the train and prevent an accident."

Section 1299: "Every railroad company that fails to observe these precautions, or cause them to be observed by its agents and servants, shall be responsible for all damages to persons or property, occasioned by or resulting from any accident or collision that may occur."

Section 1800: "No railroad company that observes or causes to be observed these precautions, shall be responsible for any damages done to persons or property on its road. The proof that it has observed said precautions shall be upon the company."

The learned judge held that the fourth subsection of section 1298, above quoted, did not apply to this case, because Nason appeared upon the road so short a time before he was struck that it was impossible to sound the alarm whistle, put down the brakes, and use any other means than were used to stop the train. We concur in this view. It is quite true that there was evidence to show that the engineer and the fireman were prevented from having a full lookout ahead by reason of the coal upon the tender, but it also appears that the engineer saw Nason before he stepped upon the track, or within striking distance of it. Until Nason did so, subsection 4 did not apply. When he did so, it was impossible for the engineer to do anything other than to reverse his engine and attempt to stop it. If the engineer had been on the lookout ahead as he came on to the crossing, without any obstruction by any of the coal in the tender, he would have seen nothing except Nason walking toward the track. In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Howard, 90 Tenn. 144-149, it was held that the engineer of a railroad was not guilty of violating the statute if he failed to take steps to stop his train whenever a wagon was seen approaching its track. It was held that it was only when the obstruction appeared on the track, or within striking distance of it, that the statute imposed the requirement of putting on the brakes, reversing the engine, etc. In the case of Louisville, N. & G. S. R. Co. v. Redmond, 11 Lea, 205, it was held that to constitute an obstruction within the meaning of this statute, prescribing the duties of the railroad company when a person, animal, or other obstruction appears upon the road, the animal must be in a position to be struck or directly injured by the engine while moving on the rails, and that the statute does not apply when the animal or person appears on some other part of the company's right of way, but that the duty and liability of the company in such a case are regulated by the principles of the common law.

Under the third subsection, the bearing of which upon this case does not seem to have engaged the attention of the learned trial judge, there is much more difficulty in supporting the peremptory charge for the defendant. This 24 L. R. A.

engine was leaving the city of Memphis. Subsection 3 requires that when a train is leaving a city the bell or whistle shall be sounded when the train starts, and at intervals until it has left the corporate limits. By reference to the first paragraph of the subsection, "at intervals" has been construed by the supreme court of the state to mean "short intervals." Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gardner, 1 Lea, 688-690. Now, there was positive evidence from three witnesses, who were near enough to hear the bell if it did ring, that it did not ring as the crossing was approached. The preponderance of the evidence was that the bell did ring all the time. But there was a conflict of evidence. There was evidence, therefore, tending to show that the precautions enjoined upon railroad companies in subsection 3 of the statute were not observed, and the question which remains to be considered is whether a right of action founded on such failure to observe precautions is barred by the contributory negligence of the injured person. If the decisions of the supreme court of Tennessee are controlling in this forum upon this point, then there can be no doubt that contributory negligence is not a bar to the action under section 1299 for failure to comply with any of the subsections of section 1298, and that the court below erred in taking the case from the jury. The last expression of the supreme court of Tennessee is to be found in the case of Knarville, C. G. & L. R. Co. v. Acuff (decided in 1893) 92 Tenn. 26. That was a suit against the railroad company for the failure to observe the fourth subsection of 1298. The deceased, for whose killing the plaintiff brought the action, was a deaf and dumb man, who was run down by a construction train. The court below was requested to charge the jury as follows: "If the jury shall find that the deceased was deaf and dumb, and shall further find that on the morning of the killing he was warned of an unusual danger from walking the track, by reason of the irregular running of a construction train, or for any other cause, and advised to take the dirt road, and still deceased, regardless of the warning, chose to walk on the railroad track, knowing that he could hear no signal, this would be such negligence as would bar recovery, and you should so find."

The court refused to give this instruction because counsel asked that it be applied to both counts of the declaration. Said Judge Caldwell, speaking for the supreme court: "The reason given sustains the action of the court. The declaration contained two counts,—one for negligence at common law, and the other for failure to observe statutory precautions for prevention of accidents when obstructions appear upon the track. Contributory negligence might have defeated the common-law action, but not that based upon the statute. As to the latter, it could be considered only in mitigation of damages."

The same rule has been laid down in a great number of cases, where the actions were founded on a failure to observe the statutory precautions in cases described in subsections 2, 3, and 4 of section 1298. Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. Wilson, 90 Tenn. 271, 13 L. R. A. 864; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Howard, 90 Tenn. 144; Patton v. East Tennessee, V. &

G. R. Co. 89 Tenn. 370, 12 L. R. A. 184; Cheapeake, O. & S. W. R. Co. v. Foster, 88 Tenn. 672; Nashville & O. R. Co. v. Smith, 9 Lea, 474; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Scales, 3 Lea, 688; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gardner, 1 Lea, 691; Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Nowlin, Id. 523; Railroad v. Walker, 11 Heisk. 388; Hill v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 9 Heisk. 823; Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Smith, 6 Heisk. 174; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Conner, 2 Baxt. 882; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Burke, 6 Coldw. 45.

The last-named case was decided in 1869, and by an unbroken line of authorities the rule as above stated has been enforced from that time down to the latest utterance of the court in 1898. The case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Howard, supra, was quite like the one at bar. There the deceased was driving a wagon across the track at a road crossing within the corporate limits of the town of Paris. The proof showed that all the statutory precautions were observed, and every possible means employed, by the company to prevent the accident, with a single exception, to wit, that it did not appear that the bell or whistle was sounded at short intervals continuously throughout the last mile before reaching the depot. The deceased was said to have been guilty of gross contributory negligence in failing to look and listen for approaching trains before driving upon the track; but the railway company was nevertheless held liable in damages for killing the deceased, the jury being required to consider deceased's contributory negligence in mitigation of damages.

The question whether we are bound by the decision of the supreme court of Tennessee as to the effect of contributory negligence in statutory actions depends on the basis given by that court for its conclusion. If the statute is held to be merely declaratory of the common law both in its requirements and in the liability imposed for failure to observe it, and the plea of contributory negligence is allowed only in mitigation of damages, because, in the view of the supreme court of Tennessee, that is the only effect it could have in an action for common-law negligence, we conceive that the effect of contributory negligence in such a case would be a question of general common law, with respect to which we might exercise an independent judgment. But if the rule of the state supreme court grows out of the peculiar liability imposed by the statute as distinguished from that imposed for negligence at common law, then it is the legitimate effect of a construction of a state statute by the highest tribunal of the state, and we are, of course, bound by it. That the rule as to contributory negligence in statutory actions is not the result of an assimilation of common-law principles to statutory negligence is most clearly brought out in Knorrville, O. G. & L. R. Co. v. Acuff, 92 Tenn. 26, above cited. There it will be seen that the court held that a certain state of facts might constitute gross negligence, and a complete bar to the action for common-law negligence, but that it was not such a bar to the statutory action. Now, it is true that it has several times been decided by the supreme court of Tennessee that the precautions enjoined by statute upon railway companies are only such precautions as the rules of common-law negligence would require them to observe. Horne v. Memphis & O. R. Co. 1 Coldw. 72-76; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Pratt, 85 Tenn. 9-14.

But it is apparent that, while the precautions to be taken are those which the common law would enjoin, the liabilities incurred for not taking them are quite different. Thus it has been held by the supreme court of the state that, if an accident occurs, a liability to the injured person is imposed upon the railway company for failure to comply with the statutory precautions, even if such failure did not cause the accident. Railroad v. Walker, 11 Heisk. 388; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Burke, 6 Coldw. 45.

In the last case the sections of the statute we have been considering received a full construction by the supreme court of the state, which construction has never since been departed from. The court said: "The railroad company is responsible for the damages occasioned by or resulting from the accident or collision, unless it shows that the precautions prescribed by these sections were performed, and although it may appear that the accident or collision would have occurred had the precaution been performed. Cases of hardship and absurdity may occur upon such construction of the clauses of the code, but the language is explicit and certain, and the construction is inevitable. These sections are not invalid for want of constitutional or sovereign power in the legislature to enact the law expressed by them. The statute is founded on a policy of double aspect,—one to guard and protect the safety of the general public, and the other to compensate the injured person,—which has sanction in what is called the police power of the government. Corporate bodies are subject, as natural persons, to general laws enacted to protect and promote the quiet, comfort, health, and safety of the people, unless exempt by reason of plain implication from the nature of the privileges or franchises granted by their charter. In the absence of such exemptions, railroad corporations are subject, as would be natural persons in like occupation, to laws prescribing extraordinary vigilance, skill, exertions, and other precautions to be observed by their servants or agents in the running of trains, for the purpose of preventing accidents or collisions, and subjecting their companies to damages occasioned by or resulting from any accident or collision, unless they show that the prescribed precautions were performed. . . . Generally the negligence of a person injured by collision upon the track is not a bar to an action by him for damages, unless the railroad company show by proof that all the precautions prescribed by the Code were performed to prevent the accident. A person injured by a collision or accident caused by his own willful act cannot, by virtue of the sections 1166, 1167 [now 1293, 1299], etc., maintain an action for damages done him, occasioned by or resulting from the collision or accident. . . . Negligence of the person injured, which caused or contributed to cause the accident or collision, or without which the accident or collision would not have occurred, may be taken into consideration by the jury in determining the amount of damages proper to be given for the injury. Such construction the clause of the code will bear, and must be given."

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gardner, 1 Lea, 688, referring to the subsections of 1288 and to 1299 above quoted, Judge Freeman says: "It was intended to enforce the strict performance of these duties by fixing arbitrarily upon the company a liability in case of their neglect."

It is sufficiently apparent from the statute and its construction by the court, whose construction of it is authoritative, that the statute is penal in character, and that the ordinary rules which obtain in common law negligence cases have no application to the defenses which may be set up to actions brought in accordance with its provisions. The cardinal principle in negligence cases at common law is that no recovery can be had unless the negligence complained of causes the injury. As we have seen, to justify a recovery under the statute there need be no causal relation whatever between the failure of the company to take the precautions required and the injury. All that is required is that the injury be caused by a collision or accident happening at the time when the precautions should have been, but were not, observed. In this construction of the statute it may be a little difficult to understand how the supreme court of Tennessee could, by reason of the contributory negligence of the sufferer, logically mitigate the damages to be recovered by him when the statute in terms gives to the person injured all the damages suffered by him. But the supreme court of Tennessee have thus mitigated the severity of the statute by construction, and it is not for us to question the power or propriety of doing so. The construction has prevailed for twenty-five years without disturbance by the legislature, and is a part of the law of the state as much as if expressly incorporated in the statutes.

That federal courts will always follow the construction given by the state supreme courts to the statutes of their respective states is too well settled to need discussion. Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 27 L. ed. 859; Bucher v. Chesire R. Co. 125 U. S. 555, 31 L. ed. 795. The last case is a much stronger one than the one at bar. There the question was whether a passenger upon a railroad could be prevented from recovering damages for an injury occasioned by the negligence of the company by reason of the fact that when injured he was traveling in violation of the Lord's day act of Massachusetts. Under a similar statute passed by the state of Maryland, the Supreme Court of the United States, in Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Philadelphia & H. de G. Steam Tow Boat Co., 64 U. S. 28 How. 209, 16 L. ed. 483, had decided that it was no defense, in a suit brought by the owners of a vessel against a railway company for an injury caused by collision with piles negligently left by the railway company concealed in navigable waters, that the injury occurred when the vessel was violating the Sunday law of the state of Maryland. Nevertheless, in view of the fact that by repeated decisions, and for a number of years, the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts had held that one receiving an injury while engaged in violation of the Lord's day act could maintain no action for damages therefor, the Supreme Court of the United States held that in administering the common law of Massachusetts with reference to the effect of the Lord's day act it would follow those decisions, and reach a result contrary to its own opinion as expressed in the previous Maryland case. It is to be observed that the main question at issue in the Bucher Case was not that of the construction of the Lord's day act of Massachusetts, for that needed no construction. It merely imposed a penalty for traveling on Sunday. The question was one of the common law, namely, what effect should it have upon the right of one injured by the tort of another that the injured person at the time of the injury was committing a misdemeanor? If, on such a question, decisions of the state courts become rules of decision for the federal courts, then clearly twenty-five years of repeated decisions by the supreme court of Tennessee as to the effect of the defense of contributory negligence to statutory actions, based on the language of the statute giving the right of action, must furnish the sole guide to federal courts in hearing and deciding such cases. See Western & A. R. Co. v. Hoberson (decided by this court at this same session) 61 Fed. Rep. 592.

It is quite true that the use of contributory negligence to mitigate the damages recoverable under these statutes was probably adopted by analogy to the somewhat peculiar rule of the Tennessee courts in cases of common-law negligence. In Louisville, N. & G. S. R. Co. v. Fleming, 14 Lea, 128, Judge Cooper explains the position of the Tennessee courts on contributory negligence as follows: "The intrinsic difficulty of the subject on contributory negligence has led to three distinct lines of decisions. In England and a majority of the states of the Union the negligence of the plaintiff which contributes to the injury is held to be an absolute bar to the action. In the states of Illinois and Georgia the doctrine of comparative negligence has been adopted; that is, if, on comparing the negligence of the plaintiff with that of the defendant, the former is found to be slight and the latter gross, the plaintiff may recover. In this state we hold that, although the injured party may contribute to the injury by his own carelessness or wrongful conduct, yet, if the act or negligence of the party inflicting the injury was the proximate cause of the injury, the latter will be liable in damages, the negligence or wrongful conduct of the party injured being taken into consideration, by way of mitigation, in estimating the damages. In other words, if defendant was guilty of a wrong by which plaintiff is injured, and plaintiff was also in some degree negligent, or contributed to the injury, it should go in mitigation of damages, but cannot justify or excuse the wrong. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Fain, 12 Lea, 35. At the same time we hold that if a party, by his own gross negligence, bring an injury upon himself, or proximately contribute to such injury, he cannot recover; neither can he recover in cases of mutual negligence."

But certainly this principle with reference to contributory negligence which prevails in the courts of Tennessee has not been applied to the statutes which we are discussing as it would be applied to cases of common-law negligence, because, if so, then, under the distinction referred to by Judge Cooper in Fleming's Case, the gross contributory negligence of the plaintiff, if the proximate cause of the injury, would entirely defeat the action under the statute. This it has been held not to do, because of the imperative language of the statute. We are thus brought back to the proposition that the rule of law in Tennessee which prevents the defense of contributory negligence from being a complete bar to the action under the statute grows out of the language of the statute itself and the construction of that language by the supreme court of Tennessee. Therefore it follows that the duty of the trial judge in the court below was to follow the decisions of the state court with reference to the defenses under this statute, and that the gross negligence of Nason was not a complete bar to the action, but should have been considered by the jury in mitigation of damages.

The supreme court of Tennessee have been very stringent in requiring that trial judges should instruct the jury, in cases under this statute, that they must reduce damages for contributory negligence. Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Nounin, 1 Lea, 528. In this case, should the same facts appear, the court should tell the jury that on the undisputed facts the deceased was guilty of gross contributory negligence, and that, if they should find the company had sustained the burden of showing that the bell was ringing as the engine approached and made the crossing, plaintiff could not recover, however negligent, in other respects, the bridge company might have been. The court should also say to the jury that they must, if they find that the bell was not rung, reduce the damages to be awarded the plaintiff by reason of his intestate's gross negligence, and that, if the jury should see fit, they may carry the reduction to the extent of making the damages merely nominal. In several cases, the supreme court of Tennessee have sustained verdicts in suits under this statute, where contributory negligence was shown, in sums which were little more than nominal. Of course, if Nason's death was the result of his own willful act, which some of the evidence tended to show, no recovery could be had, under the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Burke, 6 Coldw. 45, already cited, and that question should also be left to the jury.

For the reasons given, the judgment of the court below is reversed as to the bridge company, and a new trial ordered against that defendant.

As already stated, the judgment in favor of the Kansas City, Ft. Scott & Memphis Railroad Company is affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

REES PRINTING CO.

(.....Neb.....)

- *1. Sections 1 and 3 of chapter 54 of the Session Laws of 1891, having provided, in effect, that for all classes of mechanics, servants, and laborers, excepting those engaged in farm or domestic labor, a day's work should not exceed eight hours, and that, for working any employe over the prescribed time, the employer should pay extra compensation, in increasing, geometrical progression, for the excess over eight hours (the rate of payment for the eighth hour being taken as the basis upon which to reckon such progression).—Held, that these provisions are unconstitutional—First, because the discrimination against farm and domestic laborers is special legislation; second, because, by the act in question, the constitutional right of parties to contract with reference to compensation for services is denied.
- *2. It being apparent, from an inspection of the entire act in question, that sections 1 and 3 thereof formed an inducement to its passage, no part of said act can be sustained as constitutional.

(June 6, 1894.)

ERROR to the District Court for Douglas County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount allowed by statute for work done by plaintiff for defendant after the hours which constituted the statutory day. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Mahoney, Minahan & Smyth, for plaintiff:

A special law is such as at common law the courts would not notice unless it were pleaded and proved like any other fact. This law therefore is not a special one.

Hingle v. State, 24 Ind. 84; Heridia v. Ayers, 12 Pick. 844.

If a law is general and uniform throughout the state, operating alike upon all persons and localities of a class, or who are brought within the relations or circumstances provided for, it is not objectionable as wanting uniformity of operation.

State v. Berka, 20 Neb. 879; McAulich v. Mississippi & M. River R. Co. 20 Iowa, 338; State v. Graham, 16 Neb. 76; Cooley, Const. Lim. § 890.

A class is a collection of persons distinguished by some common characteristic or circumstance. In the class provided for by this law the characteristic or circumstance which distinguishes it is the working as a mechanic, servant, or laborer in any kind of work, excepting any farm or domestic work, not as a farmer or domestic, but in farm or domestic work. It is the character of work in which the individual is engaged that determines whether or not he belongs to the class upon which this law operates.

We have a striking illustration of this kind of classification in the mechanics' lien law, which is constitutional.

Davis v. State, 3 Lea, 876.

There is a natural and positive distinction between the body of laborers who follow the avocation of farming and the body of laborers who follow the industrial avocations.

The act in question operates upon a particular condition, and attaches to it certain consequences, and whenever that condition exists the consequences follow. The condition here is the working as a mechanic, etc.

The law is uniform.

People v. Judge of Twelfth Dist. 17 Cal. 555.

The constitution does not prohibit, under all circumstances, the enacting of special laws; it prohibits it only where a general law can be made applicable. Could a general law have been made applicable? If this be a special law, the legislature by passing it has answered the question in the negative. Is that answer reviewable by this court, or is it final? The authorities say it is final.

Purdue University Trustees*, 87 Ind. 155; State v. Tucker, 46 Ind. 355; State v. Boone County Ct. 50 Mo. 817, 11 Am. Rep. 415; Richman v. Muscatine County Suprs. 4 L. R. A. 45, 77 Iowa, 518.

The act is not violative of that provision of the constitution which declares that no person shall be deprived of his liberty or property without due process of law.

"Due process of law," says Mr. Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitation, p. 480, "means the same as the law of the land."

Courts do not declare laws unconstitutional because they are unjust, unrepugnant, or impolitic. That being so, what rule of conduct, which courts can enforce, does this act violate? None. Then it restrains defendant's liberty by the lawful exercise of a lawful power.

Murray v. Hoboken Land & Imp. Co. 59 U. S. 18 How. 277, 15 L. ed. 374.

The words "law of the land," as used originally in the Magna Charta in reference to this subject, are understood to mean "due process of law," that is by indictment or presentment of good and lawful men, "and this" says Lord Coke, "is the true sense and explanation of 24 L. R. A.

those words." The better and shorter definition of "due process of law" is that it means law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice.

Due process of law has reference only to the manner of proceeding in taking the property or restraining the liberty.

This is a "law which hears before it condemns; which proceeds upon inquiry and renders judgment only after trial."

Hawthorn v. People, 109 Ill. 302, 50 Am. Rep. 610.

Its aim is to prevent one class of citizens from depriving the other of the opportunity to earn a living; to so regulate the conduct of the employer that the laborer may have a fair share of the wealth which he produces; and to give to the laborer an opportunity to attend to the education of his children; to cultivate his own moral and intellectual faculties, and thus serve the public good.

Ryan, C., filed the following opinion:

In the district court of Douglas county, plaintiff in error filed his petition, wherein were stated three causes of action. Of these, the third cannot be reviewed, for the reason that there was no motion for a new trial filed or passed upon, in respect to it. The stipulation waiving the motion for a new trial, and consenting that the action in this court should be treated as if such motion had actually been filed and ruled upon in the district court, ignores the consideration that is due to the trial court, where the motion in question should have been duly passed upon, that whatever errors were presented thereby might be corrected. The consideration of this case, for the reason just indicated, will therefore be confined to the first and second causes of action stated in the petition. After alleging that the defendant was a corporation doing business in the city of Omaha, the averments of plaintiff in his petition were as follows:

"Further complaining, plaintiff states for his first cause of action that on the 10th day of August, 1891, he contracted with the defendant to work for it, as a printer, for thirty cents per hour; that, pursuant to said contract, he entered the employment of said defendant; and that, on said 10th day of August, said defendant worked this plaintiff eleven hours. Said defendant thereby became indebted to this plaintiff in the sum of $6.60; that is to say, $2.40 for the first eight hours worked, sixty cents for the ninth hour worked, one dollar and twenty cents for the tenth hour worked, and two dollars and forty cents for the eleventh hour worked. Of said sum thus due, defendant has paid plaintiff three dollars, and no more.

"For a second cause of action, plaintiff states: That on the 8th day of August, 1891, he, at the request of the defendant, entered into a contract with the said defendant, which contract was in the words and figures following, viz.: 'To all employes of Rees Printing Co.: From and including August 1st, 1891, all employes of this company will be employed and paid by the hour for the number of hours they work, at the same rate of wages now paid, and not by the day. Any employe who is willing to work the same number of hours as heretofore at the rate of wages heretofore paid him will report in writing at once to the undersigned. July 30th, 1891. Rees Printing Co.

"Receipt of the above rule and regulation is hereby acknowledged. I am willing to continue in the service of the company subject to the same.

August 8, 1891.

Charles G. Low."

"That the rate of compensation or wages agreed upon between the plaintiff and defendant, and paid to the plaintiff by said defendant, prior to entering into said contract, was $3 per day for each day worked by plaintiff, which day consisted of ten hours. That on said 8th day of August, 1891, the defendant worked this plaintiff ten hours, and thereby became indebted to him in the sum of $4.20; that is to say, $2.40 for the first eight hours, sixty cents for the ninth hour, and one dollar and twenty cents for the tenth hour worked. Of said sums thus due to the plaintiff, defendant has paid $3.00, and no more."

A demurrer was filed to the above causes of action on the grounds following: "(1) The said petition does not state facts constituting a cause of action against the defendant, nor does any of the counts thereof state facts constituting a cause of action in plaintiff's favor against the defendant. (2) Chapter 54 of the Acts of the 22d Session of the Legislature of Nebraska, under the provisions of which this action was brought, and by virtue of which plaintiff must recover if at all, is unconstitutional and void, and in contravention of the constitution of Nebraska and of the United States. (a) It seeks to take away and limit the right of the citizen to enter into contracts relating to legal and lawful business; (b) it seeks to abridge the rights of the people in disposing of their lawful property, and the purchase of the same; (c) it is special and class legislation, and an attempt on the part of the legislature to grant special immunities and privileges to certain employes and employers; (d) the statute, while intended to be general in its operation, excepts certain of our citizens from its provisions; (e) it seeks to abridge the privileges of certain of our citizens, and deprive them of their property without due process of law, and denies to certain of our citizens equal protection of the law, and is therefore in conflict with sections 1 and 8 of article 1 of the Constitution of Nebraska, and section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. (3) Said act is broader than the title, in so far as it provides for a penalty for violation thereof, and seeks to fix the compensation of the employe; and to that extent the provisions of the act are in conflict with section 11, article 3, of the Constitution of this state. (4) Said act is in conflict with section 5, article 8, of the Constitution of Nebraska, in that it seeks to give to the employe a part of the penalty provided for its violation."

This demurrer was argued in the aforesaid district court, Judges Wakely, Doane, and Davis presiding, by whom, upon due consideration, it was sustained, as to said first and second causes of action. Thereupon, the plaintiff electing to stand on said two causes of action, and refusing to further plead, judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of the defendant. By petition in error, plaintiff has duly presented for review by this court the same questions passed on in the district court.

Chapter 54, specially described in, and against which the demurrer was directed, is in the following language:

"Be it enacted by the legislature of the state of Nebraska:

"Section 1. That eight hours shall constitute a legal day's work for all classes of mechanics, servants and laborers, throughout the state of Nebraska, excepting those engaged in farm and domestic labor.

"Sec. 2. Any officer or officers, agent or agents in the state of Nebraska, or any municipality therein who shall openly violate or otherwise evade the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of malfeasance in office and be supplanted or removed by the governor or head of the department to which said officer is attached.

"Sec. 3. Any employer or corporation working their employes over the time specified in this act shall pay as extra compensation, double the amount per hour as paid for previous hour.

"Sec. 4. Any party or parties contracting with the state of Nebraska, or any such corporation or private employer who shall fail to comply with or secretly evade the provisions hereof by exacting or requiring more hours of labor for the compensation agreed to be paid per day than is herein fixed or provided for, shall on conviction thereof be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred ($100) dollars nor more than one thousand ($1000) dollars."

The constitutional provisions with which it is claimed the above act is in conflict are: First, the closing sentence of section 15, art. 8, that "in all cases where a general law can be made applicable no special law shall be enacted;" second, the third section of the bill of rights, that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." It is also urged against the act that it is void as an attempt by the legislature to prevent persons legally competent to enter into contracts to make their own contracts. In the present controversy there is necessarily involved the validity of the entire act; for, although only the first and third sections are directly attacked, yet it is apparent, from an inspection of the act as a whole, that these two sections formed an inducement to its passage. The act must therefore stand or fall as an entirety. Trumble v. Trumble, 87 Neb. 340.

There seems to have been an oversight as to the first cause of action, for the averments therein were, in substance, that there was a contract of employment at the rate of 30 cents per hour; that the plaintiff was, by the defendant, worked eleven hours, and had received payment to the amount of but $3,—that is, for ten hours work at the rate stipulated. On the face of the petition there was therefore unpaid 30 cents upon the first cause of action. This has not been insisted upon in argument, however, and will therefore receive no further attention.

The second cause of action avers that there was a written agreement between the parties that after August 1, 1891, employment should be by the hour, at the rate of $3 for ten hours' work; that is to say, plaintiff was to receive 30 cents per hour, but he agreed to work each day ten hours. It is alleged that on August 8, 1891, plaintiff had worked ten hours and had been paid therefor $3. According to the terms of the agreement between the parties, the plaintiff, by the payment of $3 had received all that was his due. By virtue of the provisions of section 3 of the Act under consideration, it is insisted however, that, for the ninth hour plaintiff is still entitled to receive 30 cents, and for the tenth hour he is yet entitled to 30 cents. This clearly presents the question whether a contract fairly entered into, and in compliance with which both parties have acted to the full discharge of their obligations thereunder, must be deemed modified by the existing provisions of the statute, irrespective of the intention of the parties, as expressed in their contract. Until a comparatively recent period, it would have been quite difficult to find adjudications pertinent to the legal propositions involved. For some reason, not necessary to consider, there has, in modern times, arisen a sentiment favorable to paternalism in matters of legislation. The outgrowth of this sentiment has been legislation for the regulation of the media of payment, the manner in which products shall be measured or weighed when compensation depends upon measure or weight; the hours of labor; and other kindred subjects. In each instance the statutory provision is necessarily a restriction of the right to regulate relations and duties by contract. To the fact that these attempts have recently been so frequently made, we are indebted for a number of well-considered adjudications bearing upon the questions now presented for our determination. While there has not been an entire unanimity, the decided weight as well as the number of authorities are coincident with those from which quotations will hereafter be made. That these quotations are freely made requires no other apology than that the cases quoted from are so ably and carefully considered that to them we should be hopeless to make any additions or improvement by the most careful research of which we are capable. The three several objections to the act under consideration will be taken up in the order of their statement; and considered rather in the light of authority, than in that of original reasoning or research.

1. The first section of the statute under consideration provided what number of hours shall constitute a legal day's work for all classes of laborers, except those engaged in farm or domestic labor. The argument made in favor of the necessity that, each day, the excess over eight hours should be devoted to rest, recreation, and mental improvement, loses much of its force when these very desirable benefits are, by the statute itself, restricted to certain defined classes of laborers, no one of which, independently of the statute, devotes so many hours to labor as do the classes denied the protection of the statute. Legislation of this kind is always fraught with danger. Hence arose the prohibition of special legislation, when avoidable, which is found in our constitution. In State v. Loomis, 115 Mo. 307, 21 L. R. A. 789, we find an opinion of the supreme court of Missouri (one judge alone dissenting), of which the syllabus is as follows: "Rev. Stat. 1889, §§ 7053, 7060, making it unlawful for any corporation, person, or firm engaged in manufacturing or mining to issue, for the payment of wages, any order, check, or other token of indebtedness, payable otherwise than in lawful money, unless the same is negotiated and redeemable at its face value, in cash or in goods, at the option of the holder, at the store or other place of business of the corporation, person, or firm without placing similar restrictions on others employing labor, are unconstitutional, as class legislation." In the majority opinion which was filed March 25, 1893, class legislation is ably discussed in the following language: "There is no doubt but that many of our legislative enactments operate on classes of individuals only, and they are not invalid because they so operate, so long as the classification is reasonable, and not arbitrary. Thus, it is perfectly competent to legislate concerning married women, minors, insane persons, bankers, common carriers, and the like; and the power of the legislature to prescribe police regulations applicable to localities and classes is very great, because such laws are designed to protect property, and the safety, health, and morals of the citizen. But classification for legislative purposes must have some reasonable basis upon which to stand. It must be evident that differences which would serve for a classification for some purposes furnish no reason whatever for a classification for legislative purposes. The differences which will support class legislation must be such as, in the nature of things, furnish a reasonable basis for separate laws and regulations. Thus, the legislature may fix the age at which persons may be deemed competent to contract for themselves; but no one will claim that competency to contract can be made to depend upon stature, or color of the hair. Such a classification for such a purpose would be arbitrary, and a piece of legislative despotism, and therefore not the law of the land. When speaking upon this subject Judge Cooley says: 'The doubt might also arise whether a regulation made for any one class of citizens, entirely arbitrary in its character, and restricting the rights and privileges and legal capacity in a manner before unknown to the law, could be sustained, notwithstanding its generality. Distinctions in these respects must rest upon some reason upon which they can be defended, like the want of capacity in infants and insane persons; and if the legislature should undertake to provide that persons following some specified lawful trade or employment should not have capacity to make contracts, or to build such houses as others were allowed to erect, or in any other way to make use of their property as was permissible to others, it can scarcely be doubted that the act would transcend the due bounds of legislative power, even though no express constitutional provision could be pointed out with which it would come in conflict. To forbid an individual or class the right to the acquisition or enjoyment of property in such manner as should be permitted to the community at large would be to deprive them of liberty in particulars of primary importance to their pursuit of happiness; and those who shall claim the right to do so should be able to show specific authority to do so, instead of calling upon others to show how and where the authority is negated.' Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 484. There can be no doubt that the legislature may regulate the business of mining and manufacturing so as to secure the health and safety of the employes, but that is not the scope of the second section of the statute now in question. They single out those persons who are engaged in carrying on the pursuits of mining and manufacturing, and say to such persons: 'You cannot contract for labor payable alone in goods, wares, and merchandise. The farmer, the merchant, the bullier and the numerous contractors, employing thousands of men, may make such contracts, but you cannot.' They say to the mining and manufacturing employes: 'Though of full age, and competent to contract, still you shall not have the power to sell your labor for meat and clothing alone, as others may.' It will not do to say these sections simply regulate payment of wages, for that is not their purpose. They undertake to deny to the persons engaged in the two designated pursuits the right to make and enforce the most ordinary and every day contracts,—a right accorded to all other persons. This denial of the right to contract is based upon a classification which is purely arbitrary, because the ground of the classification has no relation whatever to the natural capacity of persons to contract." After the above expression of its views, the supreme court of Missouri reviewed the authorities bearing upon the question discussed. This review we shall quote, because therein is contained a condensed statement of the purport of numerous decisions which tend to enlighten the subject under discussion. The language in which this review was made is as follows: "The supreme judicial court of Massachusetts had under consideration in Com. v. Perry, 155 Mass. 117, 14 L. R. A. 825, a statute which provides that 'no employer shall impose a fine upon, or withhold the wages, or any part of the wages, of an employe engaged at weaving, for imperfections which may arise during the process of weaving.' Stat. 1891, chap. 125, § 1. It was held that, if the act went no further than to forbid the imposition of a fine for imperfect work, it might be sustained, but that the attempt to make inferior work answer a contract for good work presented a different question; that the right to acquire, possess, and protect property includes the right to make reasonable contracts, which shall be under the protection of the courts. Says the court: 'If it [the statute] be held to forbid the making of such contracts, and to permit hiring of weavers only upon terms that prompt payment shall be made of the price for good work, however badly their work may be done, and that the remedy of the employer for their derelictions shall be only by suits against them for damages, it is an interference with the right to make reasonable and proper contracts in conducting a legitimate business, which the constitution guarantees to every one when it declares that he has a natural, inalienable right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property. Godcharles v. Wigeman, 113 Pa. 431, was an action brought by Wigeman to recover wages as a puddler. Plea of payment, etc. During the time of his employment, the plaintiff asked for and received orders from defendants, on different parties, for coal and other articles, which orders were honored by the parties on whom drawn, and the defendants paid them. It seems an act of the legislature made all orders given by employers engaged in the business of manufacturing, to their workmen, payable in goods, or anything but money, void. Speaking of these sections of the act, the court said: "They are utterly unconstitutional and void, inasmuch as by them an attempt has been made by the legislature to do what in this country cannot be done; that is, prevent persons who are sui juris from making their own contracts. The act is an infringement alike of the right of the employer and the employé. He may sell his labor for what he thinks best,—whether money or goods,—just as his employer may sell his iron or coal; and any and every law that proposes to prevent him from so doing is an infringement of his constitutional privileges, and consequently vicious and void." In State v. Goodwill, 88 W. Va. 179, 6 L. R. A. 621, a statute of that state prohibited persons engaged in mining and manufacturing from issuing orders in payment for labor, except as such should be made payable in money. It made a violation of its provisions a misdemeanor. The constitution of that state declares that all men have certain inherent rights; that is to say, 'the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and of pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.' The statute was held unconstitutional after a full consideration. Says the court: "The right to use, buy, and sell property, and contract in respect thereof, including contracts for labor, which is, as we have seen, property, is protected by the constitution." The scope of the opinion is well summarized in the headnote, in these words: 'It is not competent for the legislature, under the constitution, to single out owners and operators of mines, and manufacturers of every kind, and provide that they shall bear burdens not imposed upon the owners of other property, or employers of labor, and prohibit them from making contracts which it is competent for owners of property or employers of labor to make.' And this ruling was followed and approved in State v. Fire Creek Coal & Coke Co. 38 W. Va. 188, 6 L. R. A. 859. The statute brought in question in Millet v. People, 117 Ill. 294, 57 Am. Rep. 869, required all coal produced in the state to be weighed on scales to be furnished by the mine owners, and subjected the mine owners to fine or imprisonment for a failure to comply with its provisions. By another section [Act June 29, 1885, § 2], it was provided that 'all contracts for the mining of coal in which the weighing of coal as provided in this act shall be dispensed with, shall be null and void.' It was held that the mine owners could not be compelled to make a contract for mining coal, so as to be regulated by weight, and that they could not be compelled to keep and use scales for such purposes, save when they saw fit to make contracts for mining on the basis of weight. The law was considered repugnant to the constitutional provision that 'no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law' [Const. art. 2, § 2]; that to single out mine owners, and prohibit them from making contracts which it was competent for other employers of labor to make, was not due process of law. And for like reasons the same court held an act void which denied all persons and corporations engaged in mining or manufacturing the right to keep, or be interested in, a truck store for furnishing supplies, etc. Fraser v. 24 L. R. A.

People, 141 Ill. 171, 16 L. R. A. 492." The opinion above quoted from reversed the judgment of the second division of the same court, reported in State v. Loomis (Mo.), 20 S. W. Rep. 332, by which division it had been referred to the full bench for determination.

In State v. Ramsey County Sheriff the supreme court of Minnesota filed an opinion on January 19, 1892, which is reported in 49 Minn. 286, in which was used this language: "In Nichols v. Walter, 37 Minn. 264, it was held that the law was general and uniform in its operation which operates equally upon all the subjects within the class for which the rule is adopted, but that the legislature cannot adopt an arbitrary classification, though it be made to operate equally upon each subject within the class, and the classification must be based upon some reason suggested by such a difference in the situation and circumstances of the subjects placed in different classes as to disclose the necessity or propriety of different legislation in respect to them. In State v. Donaldson, 41 Minn. 74, a distinction or classification of dealers in medicines, based on the location of their places of business in respect to distance from drug stores, was held reasonable, and not a mere arbitrary distinction. In Johnson v. St. Paul & D. R. Co., 43 Minn. 224, 8 L. R. A. 419, this court, in dealing with chapter 13, Laws 1887, defining the liability of railway companies to their employés, said, in substance, that not only must the statute treat alike, under the same conditions, all who are brought within it, but, in its classifications, it must bring within it all who are under the same conditions. 'Such law must embrace all, and exclude none, whose condition and wants render such legislation necessary or appropriate to them, as a class.' State v. Wood, 49 N. J. L. 88. . . . No arbitrary distinction between different kinds or classes of business can be sustained, the conditions being otherwise similar. The statute is leveled against nuisances occasioned by dense smoke; and it can make no practical difference in what business the owners or occupants of the buildings in which such smoke is produced are engaged, or whether the heat evolved from the combustion of the fuel producing such smoke is applied to the generation of steam, or other useful purposes, or, further, whether steam power is used in manufacturing, or is applied to other uses, as a grain elevator or hoisting apparatus in a warehouse. We are obliged to hold that the distinction or classification attempted to be made is untenable." There is perceived no reason why a resort to special legislation was necessary in respect to the subject-matter of the act with which we are now dealing. If we are correct in this assumption, the language quoted is specially applicable to the provisions of the statute by which its benefits are withheld from domestic and farm laborers. These views are enunciated with somewhat more of confidence because they are in line with the reasoning of this court in Atkinson & N. R. Co. v. Baty, 6 Neb. 87, 29 Am. Rep. 356.

2. The third section of article 1 of the Constitution of this state provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. What is implied by the term "due process of law"? is a question which has received discussion by this court. In Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Baty, supra, it was held, in the language of the first paragraph of the syllabus, that "legislative authority cannot reach the life, liberty, or property of the individual, except when he is convicted of a crime, or when the sacrifice of his property is demanded by a just regard for the public welfare." In the discussion of the principles involved in the case from which the above quotation of the first paragraph of the syllabus was taken, Gantt, J., delivering the opinion of this court, said: "The terms 'due process of law,' and 'the law of the land,' one or the other of which is found in all constitutions of the states, are said to mean the same thing, and it is quite clear that they are indifferently used in constitutions for the same purpose. They are said to refer to a pre-existing rule of conduct, and designed to exclude arbitrary power from every branch of the government. State v. Doherty, 60 Me. 509; Norman v. Heist, 5 Watts & S. 171, 40 Am. Dec. 498; State v. Simons, 3 Speers, L. 767. Hence, these terms do not mean merely a legislative enactment, for, if they did, every restriction upon the legislative authority could be at once abrogated, for what more can a citizen suffer, than to be taken, imprisoned, dispossessed of his freehold, liberties, and privileges; be outlawed, exiled, and destroyed; and be deprived of his property, his liberty, and his life,—without crime? Yet all this he may suffer if the act of the assembly, simply denouncing these penalties upon particular persons or a particular class of persons, be in itself the law of the land, within the sense of the constitution. Hoke v. Henderson, 14 N. C. 15. Webster interprets these terms to mean 'that every citizen shall hold life, liberty, property, and immunities under the protection of the general rules which govern society. Everything which may pass under the form of an enactment is not, therefore to be considered as the law of the land.' And he says: 'If this be so, acts directly transferring one man's estate to another, legislative judgments, decrees, and forfeitures, in every possible form, would be the law of the land. There would be no general, permanent law for the courts to administer, or even to live under. The administration of justice would be an empty form,—an idle ceremony. Judges would sit to execute legislative judgments and decrees and not to declare the law or administer the justice of the country.' 5 Webster Works, 487; State v. Doherty, supra; Holden v. James, 11 Mass. 404, 6 Am. Dec. 174; Lane v. Dorman, 4 Ill. 240, 241, 36 Am. Dec. 548; Com. v. Byrne, 20 Gratt. 165; Bank of Columbia v. Okely, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 243, 4 L. ed. 561. It is, however, true that, subject to the qualified negative of the governor, the legislature possesses all the legislative power of the state; but it is said in Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 144, 40 Am. Dec. 274: 'Under our system of government, the legislature is not supreme. It is only one of the organs of absolute sovereignty, which resides in the whole body of the people.' And therefore, as the security of life, liberty, and property lies at the foundation of the civil compact, to say that 'the grant of legislative power included the right to attack private property would be equivalent to saying that the people had delegated to their servants the power of defeating one of the great ends for which government was established.' Smith, Const. Const. 434. This one great end of government is the protection of the absolute right of individuals,—the life, liberty, and property of each citizen of the state." In State v. Loomis, supra, the term "due process of law" was discussed, and applied to subjects kindred to those now under consideration. The court of appeals of Texas, in an opinion filed June 25, 1892, and found in 19 S. W. Rep. 910 (San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Wilson), cites with approval the case of Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Baty, supra. Immediately following and enforcing their approval was a full review of the same subject as had been discussed by Judge Gantt, with a synopsis of the holdings of numerous courts with reference thereto. The length of this opinion forbids an extended quotation from the opinion to which reference has just been made, but its examination will be found to further illustrate and enforce the principles laid down in Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Baty, supra. The special, practical applications of the principles to which we have just referred refer to the alleged attempt to deprive parties of the right to contract as they see fit, and will therefore be treated under that head.

3. In Braceville Coal Co. v. People, there was filed October 26, 1893, by the supreme court of Illinois, an opinion, reported in 147 Ill. 662, 22 L. R. A. 840, in which was the following language: "There can be no liberty protected by government which is not regulated by laws which will preserve the right of each citizen to pursue his own advancement and happiness in his own way, subject to the restraints necessary to secure the same rights to all others. The fundamental principle upon which liberty is based, in free and enlightened governments, is equality under the law of the land. It has, accordingly, been everywhere held that 'liberty,' as that term is used in the constitution, means, not only freedom of the citizen from servitude and restraint, but is deemed to embrace the right of every man to be free in the use of his powers and faculties, and to adopt and pursue such vocation or calling as he may choose, subject only to the restraints necessary to secure the common welfare. Fraser v. People, supra; Com. v. Perry, 155 Mass. 117, 14 L. R. A. 825; People v. Gilson, 109 N. Y. 389; Live-Stock D. & B. Assn. v. Crescent City, L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 1 Abb. U. S. 388, Fed. Cas. No. 8,406; Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 86, 21 L. ed. 894; Godcharles v. Wigman, 118 Pa. 481; State v. Goodwill, 83 W. Va. 179, 6 L. R. A. 621.

Property, in its broader sense, is not the physical thing which may be the subject of ownership, but is the right of dominion possession, and power of disposition which may be acquired over it; and the right of property preserved by the constitution is the right, not only to possess and enjoy it, but to acquire it in any lawful mode, or by following any lawful industrial pursuit which the citizen, in the exercise of the liberty guaranteed, may choose to adopt. Labor is the primary foundation of all wealth. The property which each one has in his own labor is the common heritage. And, as an incident to the right of acquiring property, the liberty to enter into contracts by which labor may be employed in such way as to the laborer may seem most beneficial, and of others to employ such labor, is necessarily included in the constitutional guaranty. . . . We need not extend this opinion by further discussion. The right to contract necessarily includes the right to fix the price at which labor shall be performed, and the mode and time of payment. Each are essential elements of the right to contract; and whosoever is restricted in either, as the same is enjoyed by the community at large, is deprived of liberty and property." For a further discussion of these propositions, reference is made to the case entitled Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 106 50 Am. Rep. 636, et seq. A complete review of the authorities upon this point will be found in Leop v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 58 Ark. 407, 28 L. R. A. 264, in which the opinion of the supreme court of Arkansas was filed February 8, 1894. It is the latest case which has come under our observation, and is strictly in line with those above quoted from and cited. A full and careful examination of all the questions presented has satisfied us that sections 1 and 3 of the Act discussed are unconstitutional, for the reasons above assigned. The legislation attempted cannot be defended as a police regulation, as was attempted in argument; for, under pretense of the exercise of that power the legislature cannot prohibit harmless acts, which do not concern the health, safety, and welfare of society. Millett v. People, Frerer v. People, and State v. Loomis, supra; Ex parte Kuback, 85 Cal. 274, 9 L. R. A. 452; Re Jacobs, and People v. Gillson, supra.

The claim that this act was a proper exercise by the legislature of its police power cannot be sustained. It results that the judgment of the district court is affirmed.

Affirmed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT (1st Department.)

Mauritz E. LYNN, Respt.,

SOUTHERN PACIFIC CO., Appt.

(....Cal....)

1. A railroad company which undertakes to transport all the passengers

NORM.—Duty of carrier permitting cars to become overcrowded.

Injuries received on crowded railroad trains.

a. Riding on the platform.

A passenger on a railroad train, injured by the negligence of the railroad company, is not guilty of such contributory negligence as to bar a recovery, where he is on the platform at the time of injury and there is not sufficient room inside the cars for the proper accommodation of passengers. Lafayette & I. R. Co. v. Sims, 27 Ind. 59; Werkle v. Long Island R. Co. 98 N. Y. 660.

And the same was held in a similar case where he was looking for a seat. Dewire v. Bolton & M. Railroad, 2 L. R. A. 166, 148 Mass. 343; Congrove v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 20 N. Y. 492, 75 Am. Dec. 418.

So where the aisles of the cars were crowded and there appeared to be no vacant seats and he was injured while on the front platform of a car on a dummy railroad. Highland Ave. & B. R. Co. v. Donovan, 94 Ala. 299.

And a passenger was not guilty of contributory negligence where he was injured by the negligence of the company while on the platform of a crowded car, although the statutory notice forbidding passengers from standing on the platforms was in the car, as exemption only applies where accommodation is furnished. Lafayette & I. R. Co. v. Sims, 27 Ind. 59; Willis v. Long Island R. Co. 84 N. Y. 670, 32 Barb. 406.

These cases sustain the position in LYNN v. SOUTHERN PACIFIC CO.

But in Camden & A. R. Co. v. Hoosey, 99 Pa. 492, 44 Am. Rep. 120, and Worthington v. Central Vermont R. Co. 15 L. R. A. 323, 64 Vt. 107, it was held that no recovery for injuries to passenger could be had where he was on the platform of the cars, and there was standing room inside.

on board a train, although some are upon platforms, must exercise all additional care commensurate with the perils and dangers surrounding the passengers in such a situation.

2. A railroad company is liable for injury to a passenger thrown from a platform of a car on which he was lawfully riding, when the accident was due to the excess

And where there is standing room inside the car, and a passenger standing on the platform falls off, in attempting to regain money given him by the conductor in making change, which is carried away by the wind, he cannot recover. Quinn v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 61 Ill. 495.

Permitting an excursion train to be overcrowded by an unexpected crowd of passengers is not of itself negligence although greater care is required of the company, and it is not negligent in failing to furnish cars sufficient to seat all that apply; and if at the time of injury to the passenger, there was room for him inside the cars and he voluntarily exposed himself to danger on the platform he could not recover. Chicago & N. W. Co. v. Carroll, 5 Ill. App. 201.

And a lame woman entering a car that was full, who was injured in attempting to cross the platforms to reach the car ahead, by falling between the buffers not looking to see where she stepped, could not recover, although the cars started with a jerk just as she was stepping across. Snowden v. Boston & M. Railroad, 151 Mass. 220.

See also subhead "Street railroads," infra.

b. Riding in other dangerous places.

A recovery was allowed a passenger who was smoking and finding the smoking compartment full entered the forward part used for baggage, and was injured by reason of a rear end collision of the train, where his ticket was taken and he was allowed to remain in that car and he had frequently rode in the same without objection. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Ball, 53 N. J. L. 233.

But where a passenger on an excursion train was compelled to ride in a high box car on account of the crowd and jumped off, after being warned of the danger when the train reached her station, and was injured, she could not recover. Evans give speed of the train, considering the curves and condition of the track which occasion a severe jar or jolt.

3. The right to stand upon the platform of a car exists, where, on the return of an excursion, a passenger with an excursion ticket is unable to get room inside the car, and is not informed that he can be carried on another train.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries received by plaintiff while a passenger on defendant's train and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. H. L. Barnes for appellant.

Messrs. Cope, Boyd, Fidelity & Hoburg, for respondent:

The stoppage of the train at one of its regular stations constituted an invitation to the public to take passage thereon.

Werle v. Long Island R. Co. 98 N. Y. 651.

If a passenger is compelled to ride upon the platform, or other exposed position, by reason of the seats and aisles on the inside being all crowded and occupied, this fact is not negligence upon his part. He is lawfully, under such circumstances, upon the platform. Riding upon the platform voluntarily, and without such necessity, has in some cases been held to be prima facie evidence of negligence.

Werle v. Long Island R. Co. supra; Willis v. Long Island R. Co. 34 N. Y. 670; Nolan v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 63, 41 Am. Rep. 345; Ginna v. Second Ave. R. Co. 67 N. Y. 596; Colegrove v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 20 N. Y. 492, 75 Am. Dec. 418, 6 Duer, 883; Treat v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 181 Mass. 371; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Fisher, 141 Ill. 614; Topeka City R. Co. v. Higge, 38 Kan. 381.

If the company undertake to carry in any one car more than they can accommodate with seats, so that some are, from necessity, forced to stand upon the platform, and have no opportunity before the train is under way to find seats in other cars, such persons are there by permission of the company, and are lawfully there; and the company can claim no exemption under the statute (General Railroad Law, § 46) no matter how conspicuously their notices may be posted in the interior of the cars.

Colegrove v. New York & N. H. R. Co. and Willis v. Long Island R. Co. supra.

The instructions were not excepted to, and afford the law for this case. Indeed, they are the law everywhere.

Geddes v. Metropolitan R. Co. 103 Mass. 295; West Philadelphia Pass. R. Co. v. Gallagher, 108 Pa. 528; Ellis v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 138 Pa. 506.

If a person voluntarily, and without necessity, rides upon the platform he only assumes the risks ordinarily incident to such a position. He does not assume the risks of the negligence or carelessness of the carrier.

Willmott v. Corriann Canal, Street & C.

ville & C. R. Co. v. Duncan, 28 Ind. 444, 92 Am. Dec. 322.

A person entering a crowded excursion car, and assuming a dangerous position, of riding on the rear part of the frame or box of the open car, with his feet on a seat, when he could have stood up, or found a seat in some other car, is guilty of such contributory negligence as will bar a recovery for damages for death caused by falling off the car. Jackson v. Crilly, 18 Colo. 103.

a. Getting on or off the cars.

A passenger prevented from alighting from a train, by the crowding in of passengers, and who is injured as he alights, by the train starting too soon and not by his carelessness in leaving the car while in motion, may recover. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Peters, 116 Pa. 206.

See next subhead.

And a passenger injured in alighting from a crowded car while in motion cannot recover. Olivier v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 43 La. Ann. 804; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Fisher, 81 Ill. App. 36. In neither of these cases does the question of crowd seem to be material, although in the first case he was obliged to sit on the platform of the car, and claimed to have been thrown off by the motion of the car.

As to injuries in getting on or off railroad trains, see note to Carr v. Bel River & E. R. Co. (Cal.) 21 L. R. A. 354.

A railroad company is liable for injuries caused by crowds at the terminal gates, where such crowds are expected and no provision made for them as opening only one gate where there were five gates, during an excursion. Taylor v. Pennsylvania Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 755.

And where a passenger was pushed or jostled off at his station while the cars were in motion, the question of negligence was for the jury, and if the injury to the plaintiff was occasioned by the surging of the crowd which could not be controlled or by the fact that such a crowd interfered with and prevented the proper management of the train, it was proper to submit to the jury whether appropriate precautions had been taken to guard against danger from the crowd. Treat v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 181 Mass. 371.

But a railroad company is not liable for injuries to a passenger caused by his being jostled off the steps of a car while alighting, by the rudeness of another passenger boarding the car. Ellinger v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 153 Pa. 212.

Nor is a railroad company liable where a person at the station is injured by a stranger rushing through the storm door and causing the same to strike the plaintiff. Graeff v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (Pa.) 23 L. R. A. 806. See further, Randall v. Frankford, S. & P. O. Pass. R. Co., Buok v. Manhattan R. Co., and Sheridan v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. supra.

Failure to provide train for crowd.

A railroad company is not excused from carrying passengers according to contract on the ground that there is no room in the train; the contract should be conditioned as to room if it is to be limited, and a ticket holder unreasonably detained and then only carried part of the journey may recover damages. Hawcroft v. Great Northern R. Co. 8 Eng. L. & Eq. 662, 16 Jur. 193.

But in Gordon v. Manchester & L. Railroad, 52 N. H. 696, 18 Am. Rep. 97, it was held that a railroad company is not liable for failure to stop for a passenger at a station where the cars are so overcrowded from an unexpected rush of passengers 106 Mo. 535; Geddes v. Metropolitan R. Co. supra.

Garoutte, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for injuries received by the plaintiff while a passenger upon the road of the defendant. The injuries were of a permanent character and very serious, and the verdict of $7,500 is not assailed as being excessive. The defendant appeals from the judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial. The record discloses no exceptions taken to the introduction or exclusion of testimony. Neither are there any exceptions taken to the charge of the court. A motion for a nonsuit was made and denied, and this appeal is now before us upon the question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict of the jury. There being no exceptions to the charge of the court,—and it is possible no just exception could have been made thereto,—the law by which we are to be guided in considering the merits of this appeal is settled, and all investigation upon that point foreclosed; for the law of the case, as far as the decision of this court is concerned, is the law that guided the jury in its deliberations in the trial court.

The undisputed facts of the case may be stated as follows: Upon the 30th day of May, 1891, a legal holiday, the plaintiff was a passenger upon the defendant's train of cars traveling from San Francisco to Shell Mound Park, having purchased a return ticket. The train was an excursion train, there being a picnic at the aforesaid park. Late in the afternoon he boarded a train to return to the city, but, owing to the great number of people that no more could be accommodated, and the train is sent back for the passengers as soon as possible, and it would have been dangerous to handle the train if more passengers had been taken on board.

And in Evansville & C. R. Co. v. Duncan, 28 Ind. 444, 92 Am. Dec. 323, which was a case of personal injury, it was stated that a railroad company is not bound to receive an unusual and unexpected number of passengers beyond what it is bound to provide with safe accommodations.

Street railroads.

A passenger on a crowded street-car, injured through the negligence of the street railroad company, is not guilty of such contributory negligence as to bar a recovery although he may be on either platform of the car, or on the side step, or in the aisle. Griffith v. Utica & M. R. Co. 43 N. Y. S. R. 535; Hadenkamp v. Second Ave. R. Co. 1 Sweeney, 490; Seymour v. Citizens R. Co. (Mo.) Feb. 27, 1893; Lapointe v. Middlesex R. Co. 144 Mass. 18; Augusta & S. R. Co. v. Rents, 55 Ga. 126; North Hudson County R. Co. v. May, 48 N. J. L. 401; Thirteenth & Fifteenth Street Pass. R. Co. v. Boudroun, 92 Pa. 475, 37 Am. Rep. 707; Ginna v. Second Ave. R. Co. 67 N. Y. 506; West Philadelphia Pass. R. Co. v. Gallagher, 108 Pa. 524; Walling v. Railroad Co. 12 Phila. 309; Germantown Pass. R. Co. v. Walling, 97 Pa. 53, 39 Am. Rep. 796; Brusch v. St. Paul City R. Co. (Minn.) March 13, 1893.

And the same was held where he was injured by collision with passing vehicles or cars, while standing on the side step or front platform. Clark v. Eighth Ave. R. Co. 86 N. Y. 125, 93 Am. Dec. 426; Geitz v. Milwaukee City R. Co. 72 Wis. 310; Topeka City R. Co. v. Higga, 38 Kan. 381; Bruno v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 55 N. Y. S. R. 215; Gray v. Rochester City & B. R. Co. 61 Hun. 212. See also Huelsenkamp v. Citizens R. Co. infra.

And the same was held in a similar case where he did not know of a double track, and the danger to be apprehended. City R. Co. v. Lee, 50 N. J. L. 435.

And a street railroad company cannot escape liability for personal injuries to a passenger, standing on the footboard of a car, where his fare had not been demanded of him, owing to the crowded condition of the car. Oggsell v. West Street & N. E. Electric R. Co. 5 Wash. 43.

And it is not contributory negligence for a passenger to surrender his seat to his wife. Lehr v. Steinway & H. P. R. Co. 118 N. Y. 553.

Or to a female passenger. Norris v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 4 Misc. 294.

And it is not contributory negligence for a passenger on a street-car that is full to stand on the 24 L. R. A.

front platform at the request of the conductor. Messel v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 8 Allen, 234.

So a street railroad company is liable for causing an injury to a passenger by allowing access to the car platform to be blocked by passengers when there is room inside. Neale v. Second & Third Streets Pass. R. Co. 113 Pa. 300.

And a person is not guilty of contributory negligence who is injured by the cars, in running alongside the car from the rear to the front, where the rear platform is crowded and the snow negligently allowed to accumulate on the side of the track by the company causes him to slip. Dixon v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 100 N. Y. 170.

So where a passenger was obliged to stand on the front platform of a crowded car, and getting off to assist the driver to replace the car which had jumped the track, was injured in attempting to regain the car, by the driver hastily starting the car, the company was liable. People's Pass. R. Co. of Baltimore City v. Green, 55 Md. 84.

And assuming that N. Y. Laws 1890, chap. 565, providing exemption from liability in case of accidents received while riding on the platform of cars, applies to street railroads, which is not decided, such roads are not exempt unless there is at the time sufficient room inside to accommodate the passenger. Morris v. Eighth Ave. R. Co. 68 Hun. 33.

And a verdict for the plaintiff was sustained, where she was injured in assisting her daughter to enter by the front platform, the rear platform being crowded, and the evidence was conflicting as to whether she got off while the cars were in motion or the driver whipped up the mules as she was alighting. Coast Line R. Co. v. Boston, 83 Ga. 367.

Where a boy passenger was moved by a street-car conductor from his seat to make room for others, and crowded out on the front platform and there pushed off by the hasty departure of a careless passenger and killed by the cars, the street railroad company was liable. Sheridan v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 36 N. Y. 39, 93 Am. Dec. 490, 34 How. Pr. 217.

But a street railroad company is not liable for injuries received by a passenger being injured by others jostling or crowding him, unless the employees could have prevented the same by use of reasonable care. Jarmy v. Duluth Street R. Co. (Minn.) Nov. 14, 1893; Joliet Street R. Co. v. McCarthy, 42 Ill. App. 49.

And the question of negligence is one for the jury, where a boy 14 years old was knocked off the front platform of a crowded street-car, by the jostling of the car; but it is not negligence per se in failing to have guards on the front platform. West Philadelphia Pass. R. Co. v. Gallagher, 108 Pa. 524.

ple desirous of returning to the city at that time, he, in company with many others, were unable to secure room inside of the cars, and thereupon stood upon the platform. The exact cause of the accident is a disputed question, but in course of the return trip the plaintiff fell from the platform, and was badly injured.

That portion of the charge of the court which is material to the present investigation is as follows: "I instruct you, therefore, that if, from all the evidence given before you, you believe that the said train stopped at Shell Mound station, the plaintiff was justified in taking passage thereon, unless you also believe the defendant or its servants gave warning to persons there in waiting not to take passage thereon, and that such warning was understood, or ought to have been understood, by the plaintiff; and, if he took passage thereon without such warning given, he was rightfully a passenger on said train, and it was then the duty of the defendant to furnish him room and accommodations inside of the passenger car; and, further, if you believe that the plaintiff did not in fact hear or know of any warning given, if you believe any was given, then he cannot be affected by such warning, and was justified in taking passage on that train. Keeping in mind what I have already said to you, I further instruct you that if, from all the facts and circumstances given in evidence before you, you find and believe that plaintiff was lawfully

But in Randall v. Frankford, S. & P. C. Pass. R. Co., 139 Pa. 464, it was held that a boy over fourteen years of age, who, finding the rear platform crowded, passed through the car, also full of passengers, and got upon the front platform, placing one foot on the step and leaning back against the dasher, and who was crowded off the car by the rush of passengers and injured by the car, could not recover unless the action of the passengers was of such a disorderly character that the company ought to have prevented it or had the means of preventing it at that time.

See subhead "Injuries from crowd," supra.

And a boy of eight years, who had forced his way through a crowded car to the front platform, and was injured in jumping off while the car was in motion, could not recover. Sandford v. Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. 136 Pa. 84.

It was claimed in this case that he was thrown off by the motion of the car.

And a street railroad company is not liable where a boy left his seat and being unable to get through the crowd on the rear platform, went to the front end and fell or was thrown off; but the evidence failed to prove the injury was caused by the negligence of the company although at that place there was a jolt of the car, and snow had accumulated on the side of the track. Payne v. Forty-Second Street & G. Street Ferry R. Co. 3 Jones & S. 8.

Where the evidence did not show that the injury was caused by the negligence of the company it was held that it is not negligence on the part of a street railroad company to crowd its cars. Mt. Adams & E. P. Inclined R. Co. v. Beul, 4 Ohio C. Ct. Rep. 362.

And where there was plenty of standing room inside a street-car and pendent straps for holding on, and the car was going at a medium rate of speed but not slackened at a curve, a passenger falling from the rear platform could not recover for injuries received. Andrews v. Capitol, N. O. Street & S. W. R. Co. 3 Mackey, 137, 47 Am. Rep. 266.

So a passenger standing on the very edge of the platform of a street-car, after an opportunity to obtain a safer place to stand, is guilty of contributory negligence, which bars a recovery when injured by a jolt, throwing him off. Ward v. Central Park & E. R. Co. 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. 411.

And a passenger who is familiar with the surroundings and knows of the proximity of a post to the track, who attempts to step on the platform of a dummy car which is crowded, and the car is moving slowly, and he has been warned of the danger, cannot recover for injuries caused by collision with the post. Aikin v. Frankford & S. P. C. Pass. R. Co. 142 Pa. 47.

And where the court refused to set aside a verdict of $5,500, for permanent injury from a fractured knee, it was stated that a lady passenger on 24 L. R. A.

a crowded street-car is bound to hold on to straps provided for support, if with reasonable convenience she can, but if she cannot she is bound to use such care and caution as a prudent and cautious woman would under such circumstances. Whipple v. West Philadelphia Pass. R. Co. 11 Phila. 845.

But in Huebsenkamp v. Citizens R. Co., 37 Mo. 537, 90 Am. Dec. 369, where a passenger on a platform step of a crowded street-car was crushed by a passing car, an instruction that if he was permitted by the agent or servants of the company to stand on the steps he was not guilty of contributory negligence, was held to be erroneous on the ground that it excluded the idea of voluntary assumption of position, and there was no evidence of direction by the employés.

Elevated railroads.

An elevated railroad company is liable where the guard in closing the gate without notice gave a passenger a violent push that carried him off the platform of the car causing injury, the car being so overcrowded as to cause difficulty in opening and shutting the gate. Miller v. Manhattan R. Co. 73 Hun, 512.

And it is not negligence for a passenger to attempt to board a crowded elevated car, and if he is jostled between the cars by the crowd and is injured in falling through for want of protection, the question of contributory negligence is for the jury. Merwin v. Manhattan R. Co. 48 Hun, 608.

But if there is standing room for a passenger inside the car it is his duty to go inside at the request of the brakeman, and a failure to obey such a request will mitigate the damages claimed for an assault of the brakeman in pushing him in. Graville v. Manhattan R. Co. 105 N. Y. 525, 50 Am. Rep. 516.

And in Graham v. Manhattan R. Co., 59 N. Y. S. R. 279, it was held that a passenger on an elevated railroad who rode on the platform which was so crowded that the gates could not be shut, and stepped off at one of the stations and then resumed his place to finish his journey, could not recover for injuries received as he assumed the risk of injury knowing the danger.

And a company is not liable for the negligence of one passenger towards another causing an injury, where there is no fault on the part of the company, and the passenger attempting to board a train receives injuries caused through collision with those attempting to alight. Buck v. Manhattan R. Co. 15 Daly, 550; Thomson v. Manhattan R. Co. 75 Hun, 548.

upon that train as a passenger, within the rules just stated to you, upon the return passage from Shell Mound, and that the defendant failed to furnish him room inside the car, by reason of its crowded condition, and that he was obliged to and did for that reason stand and ride upon the platform, and if you believe that, while he was so standing and riding on the platform, the defendant, by its servants, negligently and carelessly managed and ran its said train at such a rate of speed so that, by reason thereof, in passing over a curve in said railroad, . . . that the car upon the platform of which plaintiff was so standing was, by reason of such careless, negligent management of the train, and by such rate of speed, so swayed, shaken, jarred, and jolted that the plaintiff, without any fault or negligence on his part, but by or in consequence of the negligence of the defendant, as charged in the amended complaint, was thrown off from said car and the platform thereof to and on the ground, and thereby injured, your verdict will be for the plaintiff. I also instruct you that if a railroad company receives upon its cars more passengers than it can furnish accommodations for inside the cars, and for that reason some are compelled to stand and ride on the platform, it is the duty of the company to take that condition of things into account in the management of the train and the rate of speed with which it is run. It cannot act in disregard of the actual state of things which it permits or suffers. In that case, the obligation of the railroad company to passengers whom it receives upon crowded cars is that it will furnish such increased and more watchful and solicitous care, skill, and attention as the crowded condition of the cars require. If, therefore, the crowd of passengers applying for passage or crowding upon the cars is so great that it cannot be controlled by the train officers, and thereby over-crowds and overloads the train, it is the right of such officers to hold the train until they can secure the proper control of it; and as between the company and the passengers on board, to whom tickets have been sold for the trip, entitling them to travel thereon, it is the duty of the train officials to do so, and to furnish room inside to all such persons. If they, however, proceed upon the trip without doing so, it is their duty to use the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons for the safe carriage of the passengers, having regard to the actual location upon the train which the latter are compelled to take. The omission to use such degree of care is negligence on the part of the company."

The verdict must be sustained upon all questions where a substantial conflict of evidence is presented by the record. Measured by this test, respondent's evidence must be taken as true; and it follows that this train was traveling at a very rapid rate of speed, and while so moving, owing to the fact that it was running upon a curved track or over cross tracks, or for both of these causes, a severe jar or jolt was occasioned, which caused respondent to fall from the platform, underneath the wheels of the car. In this regard the plaintiff testifies as follows: "The train on this occasion ran faster than it ever did before. It ran very fast. . . . It ran down to the mole very fast. In my experience it ran faster than it usually did going down there. It continued at that rate of speed up to the time I fell. . . . At the point where I was jolted off, the train was going unusually fast." The manner of the accident is thus described by him: "The way I experienced it, the car was kind of going half over off the track, and gave a sudden jolt, and the way in giving this jolt I lost my hold behind me of this iron rod I had hold of, and I felt myself going, and I fell off, and that was all I knew of it. One of the jolts was made near the switch there [pointing to the diagram]. Well, it seemed the wheels struck, and kind of threw the car half-way over like. That was the sensation I had, and I could hear everybody scream. It broke my hold. I don't remember what situation I went off in, or how I struck." The witness Miss Hilda Treanor says: "After the train left Shell Mound and came down to the Oakland mole, it was running very fast. I remember about the time Mr. Lynn fell off, or was thrown off, the train seemed to lurch a little bit. When he was thrown off, I heard an outcry among the ladies inside of the car. About that time I heard a great many exclamations of surprise; for instance, 'Gracious!' and 'My gracious!' and words meaning the same thing. The lurch of the train partly threw down the persons who were standing within the aisle of the car. It had the same effect upon them as it had upon me. It threw them down. I mean by that I would have fallen upon the floor but for the people standing around me. They went over on the seats against people who were sitting in the seats. As far as I can recollect, people were unbalanced, and I myself would have fallen on the floor had there not been somebody I fell against. As it was, I did not fall right over; and, as far as I noticed everybody standing in the aisle, the same thing happened to them." Captain William Treanor says: "The train seemed to be running extremely fast, as I thought, as it came down the Oakland mole. . . . The train gave a very heavy lurch, and knocked a number of people down who were standing in the aisles where I was. I was standing up, and the young lady just inside the door, and we both got knocked down and fell over. I was facing the forward end of the car, and both of us got knocked over to the right. The women screamed. Some of them said the car must have jumped the track. I cannot remember that the car slowed up prior to that time. . . . The train ran faster than I have been in the habit of feeling trains run. . . . I thought it ran faster than I had even seen it run on that road. . . . But where I saw the lurch down on the mole, I could not positively define the point. It was running at an extraordinary fast rate of speed." The testimony of these witnesses is controlling upon these questions, and applying the law given by the trial court to the jury as to the great care which should be exercised by a common carrier where the cars were so heavily overloaded as in the present case, the jury were entirely justified in saying that the defendant was guilty of negligence in running its train at the rate of speed that this train was moving; especially in view of the defects in the track or roadbed, whatever they may have been, that caused the jar or jolt to the cars which, as we have seen, so greatly disturbed the passengers. The defendant should not have allowed so many passengers to have gone upon its cars, and, if it was unable to prevent them from so doing, it had the right to refuse to move the train under such circumstances; but if it did not pursue that course, and undertook to transport all passengers that were on board, whether within the cars or upon the platforms, it was under obligations to exercise the additional care commensurate with the perils and dangers surrounding the passengers by reason of the overcrowded condition of the cars.

Was the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence? In view of the instructions of the court, it is clear that he was not. In speaking as to the claim of the defendant that warning was given, the court instructed the jury: "If you believe the plaintiff did not in fact hear or know of any warning given, if you believe any was given, then he cannot be affected by such warning, and was justified in taking passage on that train." The plaintiff testified in unequivocal terms that he did not hear or know of any warning given, and many other passengers testified to the same effect with reference to themselves. The evidence in this regard is sufficient to create a substantial conflict as to whether in fact the passengers were warned not to crowd the train, and that a second train would soon arrive; but, beyond the question of conflict of evidence, the plaintiff says he heard and knew of no such warning; and, under the law given to the jury which we have just quoted, he had a right under those circumstances to go upon the train; and, if there was no room within the car, he then had a right to stand and ride upon the platform; and, being so situated by the force of circumstances over which the defendant, as we have seen, had complete control, he was a lawful passenger, with all the rights of any other passenger, and entitled to the same care and consideration at the hands of the company. The fact that he was compelled to stand upon the platform, and was thus more unfortunate and more inconvenienced than his friends who were able to crowd within the car, is wholly immaterial. Their legal rights were the same. The duties and obligations of the defendant to them were the same.

It is claimed the verdict is contrary to law, in this: that the court charged the jury that if they found as a fact that other cars, reasonable in number and seating capacity, were produced by the defendant within a reasonable time, prior to or after the time at which plaintiff took his position on the car, and on which plaintiff might have safely ridden, and that plaintiff was apprised thereof, an eager desire on his part to take the overcrowded car in order to reach his destination was not a reasonable cause of necessity. The evidence covered by the instruction substantially stated above is not such as to make the question one of law. It may be said that the evidence is fairly conflicting, both as to the additional accommodations to be furnished and that the plaintiff was apprised thereof. Again, all presumptions are in favor of the verdict; and, if the court's charge includes instructions of law sufficient to support the verdict when applied to the evidence found in the record, then the verdict must be upheld, even though there be no sufficient evidence to support the verdict upon some other theory of the case covered by other instructions of the court. It follows that if the evidence, when considered in the light of the law we have quoted, is sufficient to support the verdict, then the verdict cannot be against law.

We also think the motion for a nonsuit was properly denied. Much that we have already said as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict is opposed to appellant's contention in this regard. As we have seen, the evidence established a want of proper care in the running of the train at a high rate of speed, and doubly so when we consider that defects in the track or other causes existed which caused the severe jolting and jarring of the cars. Neither was the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence in riding upon the platform under the circumstances depicted by his evidence. The law given to the jury by the court upon this point is entirely sound.

For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

1. A plaintiff can recover only those benefits accrued at the commencement of the action in a suit for benefits where he is entitled to a certain sum for each week that he is sick and disabled.
2. A witness may state whether or not a person suing for sick benefits was apparently well when seen by witness at a specified time during the period covered by the complaint.
3. The relieving of a plaintiff from a stipulation submitting the case on a motion for nonsuit and allowing him to file an amended complaint is discretionary and not reviewable on appeal.

County of San Francisco in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action brought to recover sick benefits to which plaintiff claimed to be entitled as a member of defendant company. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Davis Louderback for appellant.

Mr. George D. Collins for respondent.

Van Fleet, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant and appellant is an organization, with certain fraternal and charitable features, whose membership is composed of exempt firemen. Its by-laws provide for the payment of sick benefits to any member who from sickness or accident becomes unable to earn a livelihood. The plaintiff, a member of the organization, brings this action to recover a considerable amount claimed to be due him for sick benefits, and which defendant refused to pay. Trial was had before a jury, and verdict and judgment went for plaintiff. From the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

1. The action was commenced in November, 1885, but was not tried until November, 1893. At the trial the court, against the objection of defendant, admitted evidence offered by plaintiff upon the theory that plaintiff was entitled to recover for benefits accruing intermediate the commencement of the action and the date of trial; and the court also charged the jury in accord with this theory, and refused an instruction requested by defendant limiting the plaintiff's right to recover to the benefits accrued at the date of commencing his action, to all of which defendant excepted. These rulings, we think, were clearly erroneous. The idea upon which the lower court seems to have proceeded and the contention of defendant is that the contract sued on is entire, and not severable; that it imposed a duty upon defendant to pay benefits so long as plaintiff remained sick and disabled; that, the defendant having made default before suit, this default worked a breach of the entire contract; and that all damages accruing subsequently from that sickness must be deemed to have originated in the default, to have proximately resulted therefrom, and can be recovered in the action although accruing subsequently to its commencement. But we think respondent mistaken as to the character of the contract between the parties. The contract is not entire in the sense used by respondent. It is, to the contrary, in its nature severable. The obligation it casts upon defendant is distinctly separable into independent parts. It requires defendant to pay plaintiff a certain sum each week that he is sick and disabled. The right of plaintiff to this payment for any one week accrues at the end of that week, and he is entitled to sue immediately upon default in its payment. Such default, however, does not breach the entire contract; the contract still subsists as to future benefits, and the default only affects the rights of the parties as to the benefit accrued. It is obvious that it does not work a breach as to the future benefits, since, as to such, the liability of the defendant has not become fixed, but remains contingent upon the condition of the plaintiff being such as to entitle him to demand them. The accidental circumstance that the plaintiff in this instance continued disabled from the same cause subsequent to the bringing of his action, and that defendant continued to default in payment of benefits, can in no way affect the construction to be put upon the contract. Each default was a separate cause of action in itself, and the damage accruing to the plaintiff therefrom did not flow proximately or otherwise from any previous default. The successive defaults of the defendant, and the damage resulting to plaintiff from each, were as separate and apart as though arising from entirely distinct and widely separated causes of disability. Mr. Parsons, speaking on the subject of the rule of damages applicable to a contract that is severable into parts, says: "It may happen that the injury complained of is the breach of a contract that extends over a considerable space of time, and includes many acts, or it is a tort divisible into many parts. The question then arises whether the action should be for the whole breach or the whole tort, and damages be given accordingly. This must depend upon the entirety of the contract or of the tort. If it be a whole, formed of parts, which are so far inseparable that, if any are taken away, there is no completed breach or tort left, all must be included in the demand and in the damages. But, if they are separable into many distinct breaches or torts, then an action may be brought as if each stood alone, and damages recovered." 3 Parsons, Cont. chap. 8, § 6. This we take to be a correct statement of the rule. If the default of defendant in the payment of any one week's benefits carried with it a breach of the whole contract, defendant could sue for and recover all damages proximately flowing from that breach; and this is the extent to which the authorities relied upon by respondent go. But the breach being separable, as we have seen, and not entire, plaintiff is only entitled to recover those benefits accrued at the commencement of the action.

2. It became a subject of material inquiry at the trial as to the state of health of plaintiff during the period for which he claimed benefits, the main defense of defendant resting upon its denial of the sickness or disability of plaintiff. Many witnesses were examined upon the subject, and a large number of exceptions are urged by defendant to rulings of the court in excluding evidence. The rulings complained of are all upon one general feature of the evidence; that is, as to the physical appearance and apparent state of health of plaintiff. It would not conduce to brevity nor subserve any useful purpose to notice these rulings in detail. Many of them were correct, but some we deem erroneous. Of the latter, one instance will serve to point the rule which should be observed by the lower court on a new trial: A witness who knew plaintiff quite intimately, and saw him frequently, and had conversations with him about his health during the period covered by his claim against defendant, was asked this question: "Well, now, when you saw him on these occasions walk along, when he noticed you, was he or was he not apparently well?" Plaintiff objected to the question as calling for the opinion of the witness, and the objection was sustained. We think the question was competent, and should have been allowed. It is true, as contended by respondent, that, to a certain extent, the question tended to elicit the opinion of the witness; but it called at the same time for the fact of the plaintiff's physical appearance, as a result of the witness' observation, and that fact the party was entitled to lay before the jury. There are many cases where a witness, though not an expert, may be permitted to state the result of his observation, notwithstanding it involve in a sense his opinion or judgment, such as the apparent state of health of a person, whether a person is drunk or sober, or other characteristic or state which manifests itself to the apprehension of the common observer. It is sometimes difficult to distinguish between that which is purely matter of opinion, and so not admissible, and that which partakes of the nature of a fact by reason of being the result of personal contact and observation by the witness, but this difficulty does not in any sense militate against the rule. There are many matters of importance to the investigation of truth that could not be established or presented to the jury if this were not the rule. Lawson, in his work on Expert and Opinion Evidence, at page 480, lays down the rule that health or sickness is provable by opinion, and cites many authorities from many states to sustain the principle. In Shaunestown v. Mason, 82 Ill. 387, 25 Am. Rep. 821, it was held that the fact of disease, when perceptible to the senses, may be testified to by any witness. So, in the case of Parker v. Boston & H. S. B. Co., 109 Mass. 449, the plaintiff sued a common carrier for personal injuries, and, on the trial, her daughter was permitted to testify that her mother "was decidedly worse than she was two months after the accident." The testimony was held proper, the court saying: "The witness had the means of observing the plaintiff from time to time, and her testimony was as to facts within her observation, and not a mere expression of opinion reached by a process of reasoning and deduction. She stated what she saw,—that the plaintiff was not able to do as much work and was not as well as she was two months after the accident." The same principle has been upheld in this state in a number of cases. See People v. Lavelle, 71 Cal. 351; People v. Wreden, 59 Cal. 392; and Carpenter's Estate, 94 Cal. 416. In the instance stated, and several others of like character, we think the court should have allowed the evidence.

8. The court did not err in relieving plaintiff from the effect of his stipulation submitting the case on motion for nonsuit, and allowing him to file an amended complaint. It was a matter purely in the discretion of the court, and, upon the showing made, we cannot say the discretion was abused. Ward v. Clay, 82 Cal. 502. Neither did the court err in its ruling as to the statute of limitations, nor on the doctrine of ultra vires. As to the latter question, we are satisfied that the objects contemplated by and provided for in the by-laws are clearly within the language of the act conferring upon defendant control of the fire department charitable fund.

We have carefully examined the record, and find no other error. For the reasons above given, the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: Garoutte, J.; Harrison, J.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

NORFOLK & WESTERN R. CO., Pff.
in Err.,

v.
C. C. WARD.

(..... Va.....)

1. Obedience to orders will not be deemed contributory negligence, unless the danger was so glaring that no prudent man would enter into it, even when, like the servant, he was not entirely free to choose.
2. The risk of injury from the caving in of the sides of a ditch 13 feet deep and 18 inches wide, while such ditches were not usually dug more than 6 or 8 feet deep, is not assumed by a laborer who does not know of the danger, but goes in under peremptory orders to dig it deeper.

NOTE—Upon the question of reliance upon orders as affecting contributory negligence of employé see note to Orman v. Mannix (Colo.) 17 L. R. A. 602.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Carroll E. County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Brown & Moore for plaintiff in error.

MR. R. C. JACKSON, for defendant in error: When a servant shows that his injury was in consequence of an increased risk, one not ordinarily incident to his employment, growing out of master's negligence, the burden of proof is upon the master to show that the servant knew of and understood the increased danger.

Suoboda v. Ward, 40 Mich. 420; Dorsey v. Phillips & C. Constr. Co. 42 Wis. 588; Rummell v. Dilworth, 111 Pa. 848.

It is conceded that as a general rule a servant cannot recover for injuries resulting from causes seen and known by him.

Iron-Ship Building Works v. Nuttall, 119 Pa. 149.

But when the servant acts under the orders of his master and is injured, the rule is different. For then it cannot be said with any degree of reason that the master and servant stand on equal footing, even though they have equal knowledge of the danger. The servant occupies a position of subordination and may rely on the skill and knowledge of his master and is not free to act on his own suspicions.

Shortel v. St. Joseph, 104 Mo. 114; 2 Thomp. Neg. 975.

Where a master or superior orders an inferior into a position of danger and he obeys, if injured the law will not charge him with the assumption of the risk unless the danger is so glaring that no man of prudence would have entered into it.

Mr. William D. Tompkins also for defendant in error.

Fauntleroy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

After all the evidence had been introduced the court gave four instructions asked for by the plaintiff, which were excepted to by the defendant, and gave six instructions asked for by the defendant, which were excepted to by the plaintiff. The jury found for the plaintiff, and assessed $1,100 damages. The defendant moved to set aside the verdict and for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence, which motion the court overruled, and entered the judgment complained of, upon the finding of the jury. The defendant excepted to the action of the court, and the evidence is certified. The plaintiff in error assigns for error that the judgment is erroneous, in that the court overruled the motion to set aside the verdict of the jury, was contrary to the law and the evidence, and to grant a new trial, and that the instructions given to the jury on the prayer of the plaintiff are erroneous. The appellee, Ward, received severe and permanent injury by the caving in of the side of a chamber, or "ground-hog hole," as known in the parlance of railroad track grading, 18 inches wide, and 18 feet deep, and 13 feet into the mass of impending earth to be excavated and removed, in which he was working in the employ of the defendant company, and into which he was specifically and peremptorily ordered to go, and dig and excavate it deeper; after he had dug it, and shoveled out the earth, to even a greater depth than was customary and prudent, by the supervising and authoritative "boss" in charge of the work as the agent of the appellant. The defendant company claims that the evidence fails to show any negligence on the part of the company, and that the plaintiff knew, or ought to have known, of the danger of the place and character of the work, and that he assumed the risk incident to his employment. The evidence is certified, and, in reviewing the finding of the jury upon the facts, we are confined to the evidence for the appellee where there is any conflict. Abundant evidence was introduced by the plaintiff (who is the appellee here) to show that the place in which he worked, and the method of the work, as ordered and conducted by the defendant, were not reasonably safe; and that the agent of the company in charge of the digging and excavating did not adopt or observe the requisite and usual caution to prevent or guard against the extreme danger of the work into which he specifically and positively ordered the appellee to go, and which proximately caused his severe and lasting injuries. The soil or earth in which the defendant company was constructing its roadbed was treacherous at this place, rotten, and seamy; and the evidence shows that it was known to the company's agent and representative to be dangerous to work in, by sinking chambers and undermining and breaking off the forelead or blocked-out mass. Their foreman, who ordered the appellee to go back into the hog hole, and sink it to the unusual and dangerous depth of 18 feet, knew of the risk of the undertaking, and expressed his fear that he would get his men killed in the chambers by the falling in of the sides of the rotten, loose, and seamy earth; and, only a day or two before the accident which injured the appellee, one of the chambers near by caved in, because of the character of the earth and unsupported sides of the hog hole. After Ward, the appellee, had sunk the chamber in which the accident occurred to the unusual depth to which they had been sinking them, he came out to break off the forelead, as the usual precaution for safety. Long, the standing boss, was peremptorily ordered by Hanks, the walking and chief boss, without a look or a glance of inspection by either of them, to send Ward in again to sink the chamber deeper. Long gave the order to Ward, as coming from Hanks, which Ward obeyed; and, when he had dug and shoveled out the chamber to the depth of 18 feet, one of the unsupported sides fell in, crushed the appellee under the weight of the falling mass, causing to him painful and permanent injury. Here is a distinct act of positive negligence and recklessness of the authoritative agent of the defendant company, by which, proximately and directly, a day laborer, who was bound to obey the orders of his superior, was severely injured,—disabled for life.

It is argued that the appellee, Ward, must be presumed to have known, and was in duty bound to observe, the dangerous character of the work, and therefore he assumed the dangers incident to his employment. He swears positively that he did not know of the danger of his situation and surroundings; and the jury found as a fact that he was not guilty of contributory negligence in obeying the specific and positive order of his superiors to return into the chamber and sink it deeper. Hanks and Long knew of the danger, and the duty of careful and constant inspection of the situation and progress of the work, to detect and provide against danger and injury to the laborer who was digging and shoveling dirt in this narrow, deep, and dark ditch, was wholly neglected by them, to the serious injury of the defendant's employé. An employé assumes such risks as are incident to his employment, and do not arise or ensue from the negligence of his employer, or his deputies in authority over him and his work; but the evidence in this case establishes the fact that the accident would not have happened but for the gross recklessness of the defendant company's agent. The usual plan of doing this work had been to sink the chamber six or eight feet, "break off" the loosened and undermined forehead or impending mass, before beginning to sink the chamber deeper. Had this been done in this case, there could be but little or no danger of serious injury, because the walls, being low, were not likely to fall; and, if they should commence to fall, the workmen could save themselves by getting out, which it was impossible for Ward to do in a narrow cell, only 18 inches wide, and 18 feet deep, into which he was ordered to work, and to sink the chamber several feet deeper than was usual, and that, too, in earth more dangerous and treacherous than had been encountered in the work before reaching the cut where the accident and injury happened. When the servant shows that his injury was in consequence of an increased risk, and one not ordinarily incident to his employment, but growing out of the master's negligence, the burden of proof is upon the master to show that the servant knew of and understood the increased dangers. Suoboda v. Ward, 40 Mich. 424. "If he knew, or reasonably ought to have known, the presence of danger to him in the course of his employment of the cattle chute in question, and saw fit, notwithstanding, to continue in his employment, he might be held to answer the extraordinary risk, as well as the ordinary risk, of his service. But it appears to us that this consequence of his acquiescence ought to rest on positive knowledge of precise dangers assumed, not on vague surmises of possibility of danger." Dorsey v. Phillips & O. Constr. Co. 42 Wis. 583.

If an employé, without specific command as to the time and manner, uses an obviously defective implement, the defect alike open to the observation and within the comprehension of both employer and employé, both stand upon common ground, and no recovery can be had for a resulting injury to either; but when the servant acts under the orders of his master, and is injured, the rule is different, for then it cannot be said with any degree of reason that the master and servant stand on equal footing, even though they have equal knowledge of the dangers. The servant occupies the position of subordination, and may rely upon the skill and knowledge of his master, and is not free to act on his own suspicions. Iron-Ship Building Works v. Nuttall, 119 Pa. 149; Shortel v. St. Joseph, 104 Mo. 114. "If, therefore, the master orders the servant into a situation of danger, and he obeys, and is thereby injured, the law will not deny him a remedy against the master on the ground of contributory negligence, unless the danger was so glaring that no prudent man would have entered into it, even when, like the servant, he was not entirely free to choose.

The same rule has been applied, and with sound reason, where the person injured was ordered into a service of peculiar danger, such as he did not undertake to perform, by another servant standing towards him in the relation of superior or vice-principal; and if he obeys such an order, and is injured, he may recover damages. The law will not declare his act of obedience negligence per se, but will leave it to the jury to say whether he ought to obey or not." 2 Thomp. Neg. 975. "Where there is any doubt whether the employé was acquainted, or ought to have been acquainted, with the risk, the determination of the question is necessarily with the jury." Rummell v. Dilworth, 111 Pa. 848.

The foregoing principles of law are directly applicable to the facts of this case. Of the instructions given by the court, it is enough to say that they correctly state the law, and there is nothing in them of which the appellant can complain. Our judgment is to affirm the judgment of the circuit court of Carroll county.

Affirmed.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

CITIZENS' NATIONAL BANK OF KINGMAN, Plff. in Err.,

George F. BERRY et al.

(.....Kan.....)

*The president of a banking corporation has the power to employ counsel and manage the litigation of the bank, in the absence of any order of the board of directors depriving him of such power.

*Headnote by ALLEN, J.

NOTE.—As to the authority of the president of a corporation generally to control litigation in which it is interested and to appoint attorneys, see note to Wait v. Nashua Armory Asso. (N.H.) 14 L. R. A. 380.

(July 6, 1894.)

ERROR to the District Court for Kingman County to review a judgment denying the right of the president of the defendant corporation to control the litigation in a proceeding which had been instituted against it. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. S. S. Ashbaugh and James Steck, for plaintiff in error:

The president of a bank corporation is, virtute officii, clothed with ample authority to attend to and conduct the litigation of the bank.

Boone, Corp. §§ 144, 216, and cases cited; Morse, Banks & Banking, § 143 (b), and cases cited.

Whenever a party having a direct interest in the subject-matter and result of litigation appears in court and makes known his rights and interests, he has never been denied leave to defend such interest. A moral sense of justice goes side by side with the strict lines of law, and courts are organized upon the theory and for the purpose of doing justice between litigants, rather than making a farce of judicial proceedings and the process of the courts instruments of fraud and oppression.

Messrs. Hay & Hay for defendants in error.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

George F. Berry & Co. brought suit against the Citizens' National Bank of Kingman to recover certain sums of money alleged by them to have been paid to the bank as usurious interest, and the penalty provided by the national banking law therefor. An answer containing merely a general denial was filed by Lydecker & Cooper on behalf of the defendant. A demurrer alleging various grounds was filed by R. W. Hodgson, as president. The attorney for the plaintiffs moved to strike from the files Hodgson's demurrer, and Lydecker & Cooper moved for an order requiring Hodgson to show by what authority he appeared for the bank. Hodgson also moved for an order requiring Lydecker & Cooper to show by what authority they appeared. On this motion, affidavits were introduced, from which it appears that Hodgson was president of the bank, and the owner of $30,800 of the capital stock, the total amount of which was $50,000; that the corporation had gone into voluntary liquidation in December, 1888; that Lydecker & Cooper had been employed as attorneys of the bank by the board of directors, and had never been discharged as such; and that Lydecker was one of the directors. On hearing these motions, the court ordered the demurrer filed by Hodgson stricken from the files, and sustained the right of Lydecker & Cooper to represent the bank. Thereupon Messrs. Ashbaugh & Steck asked leave to file an answer on behalf of the president of the bank, under employment from him, setting up the fact that Berry and Jett, the plaintiffs, were directors in the bank at the time of the alleged usurious transaction, and also the facts with reference to the bank having gone into voluntary liquidation, and other matters of defense. The court refused to consider such answer, and held that Hodgson had no right to be heard. The case was then tried, and a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiffs for $940.12. Aside from the fact that Hodgson was the party principally interested in the result of the litigation, it appears that he was president of the bank at the time it went into liquidation, and, if the corporate existence of the bank had not terminated, was still its president.

In Morse on Banks and Banking (sec. 143) it is said: "Indeed, it is a singular fact that the entire collection of judicial authorities justifies the enunciation of only one act as falling within the properly inherent power of the president. This solitary function is to take charge of the litigation of the bank. There is no question that this matter belongs to him by virtue of his office. He may institute and carry on legal proceedings to collect demands or claims of the bank. He may appear, answer, and defend in suits against the bank. He may retain and employ counsel on behalf of the bank. See also Boone, Banking, § 144, and cases cited.

It is said in the brief that, as the evidence is not all contained in the record, the court cannot consider the case. It is immaterial whether the case contains all the evidence or not, for the substance of the claim of the plaintiff in error is that it was refused a hearing. There is nothing in the record showing that the board of directors had attempted to take away from the president the power to employ attorneys and conduct the bank's litigation. The mere fact that the board of directors had employed counsel would not necessarily take away from the president the right to control a case in court, and to have the bank represented by other counsel, if he saw fit.

It was error for the court to deny the president this right, and the judgment is therefore reversed.

PEOPLE of the State of Michigan

Abijah EATON, Plff in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

Telegraph poles in a highway do not constitute an additional servitude upon the fee for which owners must be compensated.

(McGrath, Ch. J., dissents.)

(May 18, 1894.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Barry County to review a judgment convicting him of assault and battery for interfering with the employes of a telegraph company who were attempting to set poles in a highway in front of his property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. William O. Lowden and Charles G. Holbrook for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. A. A. Ellis and James A. Sweezy, for defendants in error:

It cannot be of any benefit to the respondent in this case, that the incorporation of the Barry County Telegraph Association, at the time of the assault, had not been completed. That is a matter that concerned the state only.

Whipple v. Parker, 29 Mich. 369; Toledo & A. R. Co. v. Johnson, 55 Mich. 456; Nichols v. Ann Arbor & Y. Street R. Co. 16 L. R. A. 371, 87 Mich. 368; Whitney v. Wyman, 101 U. S. 892, 25 L. ed. 1050.

The public nature of transmitting intelligence by the use of electric telegraphs is decided by the legislature in both of the acts above referred to. It is also recognized by the congress of the United States in an Act made March 1, 1884, making all public roads and highways "military or post roads," and giving to any company the right to erect electric telegraph lines thereon under certain conditions.

U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 3964, 5263, 5668; Pennsylvania Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 96 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 709.

Highways, within and through a state, are constructed by the state, and are under legislative control.

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 588.

When the highway is not restricted in its dedication to some particular mode or use, it is open to all suitable methods.

Macomber v. Nichols, 84 Mich. 216, 23 Am. Rep. 523; Starr v. Camden & A. R. Co. 24 N. J. L. 597; Boston v. Richardson, 18 Allen, 146; Com. v. Temple, 14 Gray, 69; Chase v. Sutton Mfg. Co. 4 Cush. 152.

No right to take the private property of the owner of a fee in the highway is conferred by the telegraph acts of this state; all that is given is the right to use the land to place posts upon, the whole beneficial use of which had been previously taken from the owner for the use of the public, and for which the owner has been paid the full market value of the land, for the perpetual easement, with no reduction for the reversionary interest.

Detroit v. Chaffee, 68 Mich. 635; Detroit City Railway v. Mills, 85 Mich. 658; Pierce v. Drew, 186 Mass. 75, 49 Am. Rep. 7; Macomber v. Nichols, 84 Mich. 213, 23 Am. Rep. 523; Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Heisel, 38 Mich. 62, 81 Am. Rep. 806; Nichols v. Ann Arbor & Y. Street R. Co. 16 L. R. A. 371, 87 Mich. 369;

NOTE.—Telegraph or telephone poles as additional burden on highway.

The numerical weight of authority is in favor of the proposition that telegraph and telephone poles constitute additional burdens upon a highway which entitles the abutting owner to compensation at least in the case of country roads.

Some of the cases have made the old distinction between cases in which the fee is in the abutting owner and those in which the fee is in the public, but such distinction in these cases is likely to fall with the growing tendency of late cases to ignore it in all cases of encroachment upon the rights of abutting owners.

Poles are an additional servitude on a country road. Eels v. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 65 Hun, 516; Blashfield v. Empire State Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 71 Hun, 632; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Williams, 8 L. R. A. 429, 86 Va. 696; Smith v. Central District Printing & Teleg. Co. 2 Ohio Ct. Ct. Rep. 269; Board of Trade Teleg. Co. v. Barnett, 107 Ill. 607, 47 Am. Rep. 453.

The legislature has no power to authorize the use of a street for telegraph poles, and a company cannot therefore invoke the power of the court to restrain abutting owners from interfering with its poles, although it has erected them under authority of the legislature. Metropolitan Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Colwell Lead Co. 87 How. Pr. 365, 18 Jones & S. 468.

Telephone poles are an additional burden, when the fee is in the abutting owner and he may recover damages, and although the fee is in the public, if he sustain direct and immediate injuries by reason of the construction of the line in the street. Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. v. Mackenzie, 74 Md. 28.

In Willis v. Erie Teleg. & Teleph. Co. 37 Minn. 347, the members of the court were evenly divided upon the question, thereby affirming a judgment of the lower court against the company.

Compensation to abutting owners is a condition precedent to the right to erect the poles. Dusenbury v. Mutual Teleg. Co. 11 Abb. N. C. 440.

In Broome v. New York & N. J. Teleph. Co. 42 N. J. Eq. 141, a mandatory injunction was granted to compel the removal of poles which had been set without obtaining lawful authority to set them from public authorities who had power to grant it. In State v. New York & N. J. Teleph. Co. 51 N. J. L. 82, commissioners were appointed to assess damages for the erection of poles upon the street.

If the proposed poles will interfere with or obstruct the light, air, or access to any buildings which the abutting owner may erect, or render more difficult the access to his premises under any use to which they may be applied, compensation must be made before they can be erected. Clausen v. Baltimore & O. Teleg. Co. New York Daily Reg. Sept. 19, 1884.

Compensation must be made, although the fee is in the public. Stowers v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. 13 L. R. A. 364, 66 Miss. 550.

So it has been held that where the grant to the public is of a right of way for a public road, reserving the fee in the owner of the adjacent prop-

Grand Rapids Street R. Co. v. West Side Street R. Co. 48 Mich. 438; People v. Fort Wayne & E. R. Co. 16 L. R. A. 752, 92 Mich. 522; Dean v. Ann Arbor Street R. Co. 98 Mich. 330.

In these cases the fee of the land, over which the street or highway passed, remained in the abutting owners.

The court is supported in these opinions by—

People v. Kerr, 27 N. Y. 188; Kellinger v. Fort Second Street & G. Street Ferry R. Co. 50 N. Y. 206; Mahady v. Bushwick R. Co. 91 N. Y. 148, 48 Am. Rep. 661; Elliott v. Fair Haven & W. R. Co. 32 Conn. 579; Atty. Gen. v. Metropolitan R. Co. 125 Mass. 515, 28 Am. Rep. 264; Roake v. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 41 N. J. Eq. 85; Briggs v. Lewiston & A. Horse R. Co. 79 Me. 383.

Highways and streets in cities are also used as a convenient place for placing gas and steam pipes, for heating and lighting; immense sewers may be dug therein for the drainage of private estates, and the soil removed and water mains therein placed.

Angell, Highways, § 312; Com. v. Lowell Gas Light Co. 12 Allen. 75; Murray v. Berkshire County Comrs. 12 Met. 455; Pulatine v. Kreuger, 121 Ill. 74; Detroit City Railway v. Mills, 85 Mich. 654; Pierce v. Drew, 186 Mass. 75, 49 Am. Rep. 12; Boston v. Richardson, 18 Allen. 146; Atty. Gen. v. Metropolitan R. Co. 125 Mass. 515, 28 Am. Rep. 264.

Another important use for which highways are laid out and established is the communication of intelligence and transmission of information.

Julia Bldg. Assn. v. Bell Teleph. Co. 88 Mo. 258, 57 Am. Rep. 398; Pierce v. Drew, supra; State v. Flad, 28 Mo. App. 185.

The electric telegraph is simply a different and valuable method of communicating intelligence and transmitting information for which highways were originally designed and the land appropriated.

It was in common use before Michigan became a state, or established this highway.

See 22 Encyclopedia Britannica, pp. 112, 118.

When the land was originally appropriated for highways, that which was taken was not merely the privilege of exercising the uses for which they were intended, by the then common methods, for either traveling, conveyance of passengers or freight, or the transmission of intelligence, and that the public was not foreclosed from the benefits of possible inventions and discoveries thereon. The tendency of modern decisions is to extend the public easement, rather than to restrict it.

Omaha Horse R. Co. v. Omaha Cable Tramway Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 324; Detroit City Railway v. Mills, 85 Mich. 652; Angell, Highways, § 112; Pulatine v. Kreuger, supra; People v. Kerr, 27 N. Y. 188; Elliott v. Fair Haven & W. R. Co. 32 Conn. 579; Com. v. Temple, 14 Gray, 69; Atty. Gen. v. Metropolitan R. Co. 125 Mass. 515, 28 Am. Rep. 264; Pierce v. Drew, 186 Mass. 75, 49 Am. Rep. 12; Pulton v. Short Route R. Transfer Co. 85 Ky. 640; Moss v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. 21 Ill. 516; Julia Bldg. Assn. v. Bell Teleph. Co. 88 Mo. 258, 57 Am. Rep. 398; Stanley v. Davenport 54 Iowa, 463, 37 Am. Rep. 216; State v. Flad, 28 Mo. App. 185.

Unless there is a clear infraction of the constitutional provision, the practical construction which the people have placed upon it must be adopted by the court.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 81; People v. Hammond, 18 Mich. 256; Westinghausen v. People, 44 Mich. 265; People v. Goodwin, 22 Mich. 500; Frey v. Michie, 68 Mich. 323; Detroit City

erry, the placing of telegraph poles upon the highway is an additional burden for which he is entitled to compensation. Pacific Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Irvine, 49 Fed. Rep. 113.

But in Louisiana it is held that where the fee is in the public abutting owners in front of whose premises poles are erected under the authority of the municipality cannot ask for their removal if they do not materially obstruct them in the free use of their property, or invade some vested right, and do not inflict on them injury which is not common to all other persons, and they cannot ask to have the poles abated as a nuisance. Irwin v. Great Southern Teleph. Co. 37 La. Ann. 63.

And in Massachusetts it is held that even the owner of the fee is entitled to no compensation. Pierce v. Drew, 186 Mass. 75, 49 Am. Rep. 7.

In Julia Bldg. Assn. v. Bell Teleph. Co. 88 Mo. 258, 57 Am. Rep. 398, the court held that erecting telephone poles in the street was not an additional burden entitling the abutting owner to compensation, if the street was a city street, although in making the erection the company cut into a base ment constructed by the abutting owner under the sidewalk. In that case the court makes a distinction between a country road and a city street.

That case is recognized as authority in St. Louis v. Bell Teleph. Co. 2 L. R. A. 273, 96 Mo. 623, which was a prosecution against a telephone company for violating a city ordinance regulating the rate of charges.

An abutting owner cannot maintain a suit for injunction unless he suffers special damages different from that suffered by the public at large. Gay v. Mutual Union Teleg. Co. 12 Mo. App. 483.

In Forsythe v. Baltimore & O. Teleg. Co., 12 Mo. App. 494, the authority of Gay v. Mutual Union Tel. Co. was recognized, but the company was enjoined from erecting a broken and unsightly pole.

In District of Columbia it is held that the inconvenience which would be caused by the erection of poles in the highway to the owners and occupiers of stores situated thereon is not such as to cause equity to enjoin them as a private nuisance. Hewett v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 4 Mackey, 424.

The mere stretching of wires in front of property which are attached to poles in front of adjoining property will not authorize a preliminary injunction. Roake v. American Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 41 N. J. Eq. 85.

But even where the right to set the poles is recognized the tendency is to compel the companies to do as little damage as possible. The cutting of trees to clear the way for the electric line may entitle the landowner to damages as in the case of Dailey v. State, post, 724, although in that case the Ohio court adds the weight of its dictum to the authorities holding poles an additional burden.

There is no right to cut trees on private property for the purpose of making a right of way for a telegraph or telephone line. Memphis Bell Teleph. Co. v. Hunt, 16 Lea, 456, 57 Am. Rep. 237.

Even though a fire alarm telegraph company has the right to place its poles and wires in the street, it cannot cut trees on adjoining property unnecessarily. Tisot v. Great Southern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. 39 La. Ann. 993.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Respondent was convicted of an assault and battery upon L. B. Bently. It appears that Bently, in company with three other men, were in the act of digging holes to set telegraph poles in the highway in front of the farm of defendant. Defendant forbade them doing so, and ordered them to desist, which they refused, whereupon he pushed Bently down a slight embankment. It is not claimed that any serious harm was done him, or that respondent used any more force than necessary to stop the work. It was claimed on the trial that Mr. Bently and his companions represented, and were the employes of, a certain company, known as the Barry County Telegraph Association, incorporated under the provisions of chapter 101 of Howell's Statutes, and that they informed respondent that they were erecting a telegraph line along the highway, and were acting for an association, and that the state gave them the right to do so. The articles of association of the company were not filed with the secretary of state until after the assault complained of, but they had been signed in due form of law, and were subsequently acknowledged and filed as provided by law. The statutes of this state relating to electric telegraph lines, so far as they appear to be material to this case, may be briefly summarized as follows: Chapter 100, How. Stat., is, "An act authorizing any person to construct lines of electric telegraph in the state of Michigan." It is Act No. 4 of the Session Laws of 1847, as amended in 1849 and 1878. Section 1 provides: "That any person or persons may be and they are hereby authorized to construct and maintain lines of electric telegraph, together with all necessary fixtures appurtenant thereto, from point to point upon and along any of the public roads, highways . . . of this state, or upon or over the land of any individual—the owner of any land through which said telegraph line may pass, and railroad corporation on whose right of way the same may be constructed, having first given consent: provided, that the same shall not in any instance be so constructed as to incommode the public in the use of said roads, highways, railroads or bridges. . . ." Chapter 101, being Act No. 59 of the Session Laws of 1851, as amended in 1863, 1878, and 1875 is, "An act to authorize the formation of telegraph companies." Section 5 provides that: "Such association is authorized to enter upon, and construct, and maintain lines of telegraph through, along and upon any of the public roads and highways, or across or under any of the waters within the limits of this state, by the erection of the necessary fixtures, including posts, piers, or abutments for sustaining the cords or wires of such lines: provided, that the same shall not be so constructed as to incommode the public use of said roads or highways, or injuriously interrupt the navigation of said waters: and provided further, that this act shall not be construed to authorize any such association to injure, deface, tear, cut down, or destroy any tree or shrub planted along the margin of any highway in this state, or purposely left there for shade or ornament. . . ." Section 6 provides for the appointment of commissioners by the circuit court to assess damages, on the application of any person through whose land said lines shall pass, who shall consider himself aggrieved or damaged thereby.

The principal question in this case is whether these acts conflict with article 15, § 9, of the Constitution, which provides, "The property of no person shall be taken by any corporation for public use without compensation being first made or secured in such manner as may be prescribed by law." Is the placing of telegraph poles along a public highway an additional servitude upon the land of the adjacent proprietor? Public highways are under legislative control. They are for the use of the public in general, for passage and traffic, without distinction. The restrictions upon the use are only such as are calculated to secure to the general public the largest practicable benefit from the enjoyment of the easement. When the highway is not restricted in its dedication to some particular mode of use, it is open to all suitable methods. Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 588. It has been settled in this state that lands to be taken or granted for public highways are so taken or granted for all the purposes for which they may be used for the benefit of the public for the passing or repassing of travelers thereon, for the transportation of passengers by stage coach, omnibus, or street cars propelled by horses, steam, or electricity, and that the laying of tracks for such street cars is not an additional servitude upon lands of adjacent proprietors. In Detroit City Railway v. Mills, 85 Mich. 634, the defendant threatened to cut down and destroy the poles erected for stringing wire for the use of an electric street railway, and the claim was made by the defendant that he had the right to remove such poles because they were an additional servitude. It was held that he had no such right; that the erection of poles for such a road was in the furtherance of public travel; and that, to constitute an additional servitude, there must be an injury to the present use and enjoyment of the land. See also People v. Fort Wayne & E. R. Co. 92 Mich. 523, 16 L. R. A. 753; Dean v. Ann Arbor Street R. Co. 98 Mich. 380. It is difficult to see any distinction between the use of the highway for electric railway poles and poles erected for the use of telegraph or telephone companies. In commenting upon this claimed distinction, Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations (4th ed. p. 893, note), says: "The distinction is so fine as to be almost impalpable." These telegraph construction acts have been in force in this state for many years, and this is the first time in the history of the state, so far as I have discovered, where it has been claimed that the placing of such poles in the highway is an additional servitude. We are aware that in some states the doctrine is laid down that the placing of such poles creates additional servitude upon the fee, but there are many cases holding the other way. Pierce v. Drew, 186 Mass. 79, 49 Am. Rep. 7, and Julia Bldg. Assn. v. Bell Telph. Co. 88 Mo. 258, 57 Am. Rep. 398, hold that additional servitude is not created; and, we think, upon better reasoning. These cases accord with the views of this court in Detroit City Railway v. Mills, supra, and other cases in this state relative to the use of the street for street-railway purposes. If damage follows from the erection of such poles, the acts provide a method of settling that question.

We think there is nothing in the claim that the articles of association were not filed at the time of the assault. Under chapter 100, any private person may erect telegraph poles along the highway, under certain restrictions.

When these lands were taken or granted for public highways, they were not taken or granted for such use only as might then be expected to be made of them, by the common methods of travel then known, or for the transmission of intelligence by the only methods then in use but for such methods as the improvement of the country, or the discoveries of future times, might demand. The parties setting these poles were acting under color of legal right. The statute under which they acted is not in conflict with the provisions of the constitution above cited. It would be a great calamity to the state if, in the development of the means of rapid travel, and the transmission of intelligence by telegraph or telephone communication, parties engaged in such enterprises were compelled to take condemnation proceedings before a single track could be laid, or a pole set. The legislature certainly has never so regarded this provision of the constitution, and never till now, when more than 40 years have elapsed since the passage of these acts, has any one supposed that such a construction was to be placed upon the provisions of the constitution.

The conviction must be affirmed.

Grant, Montgomery, and Hooker, JJ., concurred with Long, J.

McGrath, Ch. J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice Long. I think that Mr. Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations (4th ed. § 898a), lays down the correct rule. He says: "On the whole, the safer and perhaps sounder view is that such a use of the street or highway, attended, as it may be, especially in cities, with serious damage and inconvenience to the abutting owner, is not a street or highway use, proper, and hence entitles such owner to compensation for such use, or for any actual injury to his property caused by poles and lines of wire placed in front thereof." The theory upon which it has been held that the construction of street-railway tracks in streets is not an additional servitude is that the purpose of the tracks is to facilitate travel upon the street, and the cases which support the right to erect trolley poles have been put upon the ground that the poles and wires are directly ancillary to such use of the street. This class of cases make a distinction between trolley poles and wires, which are incidents of that system of transportation, and telegraph and telephone poles, which are not used to facilitate the use of the street. It is with reference to this attempted distinction that Mr. Dillon makes use of the language quoted by Mr. Justice Long, and found in 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, 4th ed. p. 893, note. I think that the judgment should be reversed.

R. J. DAILEY et al., Plffs. in Err.,

v.

STATE of Ohio.

(.....Ohio.....)

- *1. An owner of land adjoining a public highway whose title extends to the center of the road, who has cultivated shade trees, planted partly on his own land and partly in the line of the highway within the bounds of his deed, has a property interest in such trees, and the right to their enjoyment subject only to the convenience of public travel.
2. The legislature may authorize the construction of a telegraph line by a telegraph company upon a public *Headnotes by the Court.

NORM.—As to how far telegraph and telephone poles constitute an additional burden on a highway, together with the rights of their owners to cut trees to make place for them, see note to the preceding case of PEOPLE v. EATON, ante, 721. 21 L. R. A.

highway, in such manner as not to accommodate the public in the use of such highway, but authority so given does not empower such company to injure the property of an adjoining land owner, nor to appropriate any of his property rights in the highway except upon the condition that compensation be first made. Nor is warrant given to injure such property, nor to appropriate such property rights without compensation, by the Act of Congress of July 24, 1866, known as section 5203, et seq., of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

3. The property right of such owner in trees thus cultivated by him is a proper subject of legislation for its protection. And one who, having knowledge of the rights of such land owner in the trees proceeds, against the protest of such owner, heedlessly, recklessly, and carelessly to injure them, may be prosecuted under section 6860 of the Revised Statutes, for a wrongful injury to property.
4. The simple fact that the land owner did not, at the time the telegraph line was built, although aware of the purpose to build, object and prevent its construction by injunction proceedings, will not estop him, after the expiration of ten years from the date of such construction, from asserting his property interest in the highway and in the trees growing upon and in front of his premises.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Portage County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas convicting defendants upon an indictment for wrongfully cutting shade trees in a highway. Affirmed.

Statement by Spear, J.:

At the September term, 1892, of the court of common pleas of Portage county, the plaintiffs in error, R. J. Dailey, William Donahue, Edward Lingle, and S. W. Kennedy, were tried upon an indictment which charged that, on the 22d of September, 1892, they "wrongfully, unlawfully, and without lawful authority, did injure eight maple trees, the property of one E. E. Taylor, standing and growing upon land not that of said R. J. Dailey, William Donahue, Edward Lingle, and S. W. Kennedy, nor of each, either, nor of any of them, by cutting and severing from said trees, and from each and all of them, certain limbs and branches belonging thereto, and by otherwise injuring and defacing each and all of said trees and the bark thereof, contrary to the form of the statute," etc., etc.

The record shows that E. E. Taylor owned lands adjoining, and to the center of, a public highway. The road was about sixty-six feet in width, and had been established for over fifty years. His frontage was about one third of a mile. The trees, some sixty in number, were planted by Mr. Taylor about forty years since, chiefly inside of the fence which was on the line of the highway. In the year 1882, a telegraph company, without obtaining consent of Mr. Taylor, or in any way appropriating a right to do so, erected its line upon the highway in front of his premises placing the poles from twelve to sixteen feet from the fence line. The poles were about one hundred and thirty feet apart, and on them were fastened cross-arms six feet in length, upon which were stretched fourteen wires.

The defendants (now plaintiffs in error) were employes of the Postal Telegraph Cable Company, and acted under orders from the company in cutting the trees. At the time of the occurrence Mr. Taylor objected, telling the men that the trees were his as the owner of adjoining lands; that they had no right to cut them, and ordered them to desist. They replied that the branches interfered with the working of the line; that they had been directed to trim, and would do so. The trimming marred the symmetry of the trees, tended to make them one-sided, and injured them.

The Postal Telegraph Cable Company, which now operates the line, is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New York, in the year 1886, having lines extending through many of the states, and into 24 L. R. A.

Canada. On March 17, 1886, the company filed with the Postmaster General of the United States its acceptance, by resolution duly adopted, of the requirements of section 5268, and following, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and of all the restrictions and obligations required by law, in order to make its line an instrument of interstate commerce. When the company took possession of this line does not appear.

The defendants were found guilty. Sentence followed, which, upon error to the circuit court was affirmed. To reverse these judgments the present proceeding in error is brought.

Messrs. Woolf & Moore and I. T. Siddall, for plaintiffs in error:

The plaintiffs in error were justified in the belief that the land owner had waived his right to have appropriation of said land or right of way, and all objection to the maintenance of said line in the position it then occupied in a proper manner, which included the moving of obstructions from the wires of the same, and were justified in the belief that Mr. Taylor was desirous that the proper care and protection of this public improvement should be exercised by the company.

Hargis v. Kansas City, O. & S. R. Co. 100 Mo. 210.

The company had a right to occupy said road under the authority given it by the federal government.

See U. S. Rev. Stat. 2d ed. 1878, §§ 5268, 5269, 5270, p. 1019; Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158; Rothman v. Western U. Tel. Co. 127 U. S. 411, 32 L. ed. 229; Pennacola Tel. Co. v. Western U. Tel. Co. 96 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 708.

The consent of Mr. Taylor to the erection of that telegraph line had been obtained, and the state of Ohio, the defendant in error, in this case, could not and cannot interfere with the proper maintenance and use of that telegraph line, existing, as it did, under the authority of the federal government.

The state, by an act of the legislature, had granted the right of the telegraph companies to occupy the public highways of the state, provided they did not interfere with public use, and the United States had granted the same right to persons, companies, or corporations for like purposes.

These were used to justify these men in making the claim they did and sufficient to warrant them in forming an honest belief that frees acts done under that claim and in harmony with that belief from criminality.

Spear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The conviction was had under section 6880 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that: "Whoever wrongfully, and without lawful authority, cuts down or destroys, or by girdling, or any other means, injures any vine, bush, shrub, sapling, or tree, standing or growing upon land not his own, or severs from the land of another, or injures, or destroys, any product standing or growing thereon, or other thing attached thereto, shall be fined in any sum not more than one hundred and fifty dollars, or imprisoned not more than thirty days, or both."

Objection was made at the trial to the admission of any evidence under the indictment. Exceptions were also taken to the refusal to charge divers propositions tendered by counsel for defendants. But the principal question in the case is raised by the exception to the following instruction given by the court to the jury, viz.:

"Upon the question as to the rights of the telegraph company, the court says to you that at the time of the erection of the poles and the construction of the telegraph line, whether in 1882 or 1884, the land upon which this highway was situated was the property of Mr. Taylor, subject to the right of way for public use for highway; that is, for travel and keeping it in repair as a highway."

"As between Mr. Taylor and other individuals or corporations it could be used for no other purpose without entitling him to compensation for such use; and the entry of this telegraph company upon his land without compensation to him, or without an agreement between him and such corporation, if you find this corporation did so enter, was not a rightful entry or occupancy; and as to the trees growing upon this land at the time such company constructed its lines, as between him and such corporation he had the right to have the trees remain and grow there without injury, whether such injury was necessary or not to the use of the lines of such telegraph company. The United States could not, nor has it attempted to take away by any statute that right. Mr. Taylor's right to maintain the trees in the ordinary way was an absolute right, and this right could be taken from him in no way until such time as they acquired the right to maintain such lines by prescription, which means actual occupancy for twenty-one years or more, or by appropriation or agreement; and for this company, by its agents without first acquiring the right, to enter upon this land and to cut the trees growing thereon, would be proceeding without lawful authority."

If this instruction is wrong the conviction cannot stand.

It is maintained by the plaintiffs in error that the charge is erroneous because the Postal Telegraph Cable Company derived authority by force of sections 3454, and following, of the Revised Statutes of Ohio, and of section 5263, and following, of the Revised Statutes of the United States (by which its line is made an instrument of interstate commerce), to enter upon and occupy the highway for its telegraph line, and was therefore rightfully there for the purposes of its business and that as it appears that what was done by the employees of the company in the way of trimming the trees of Mr. Taylor was done to prevent the branches from interfering with the operation of the telegraph line, their acts could not be in violation of any right of Mr. Taylor, inasmuch as he could not be possessed of any right to intrude, by growing trees or otherwise, upon the right of occupancy and use thus acquired and enjoyed by the company. Such acts would not be, within the meaning of our criminal statute, wrongful, nor could the land, as respects the company thus rightfully in occupancy of the highway, be esteemed the land of another within the meaning of section 6880.

The sections of the Ohio statutes cited give authority to any magnetic telegraph company to construct telegraph lines from point to point along and upon any of the public roads and highways, etc., etc., but the same shall not incommode the public in the use of such highway. Any such company may enter upon any land, whether held by an individual or a corporation, and whether acquired by purchase or by appropriation, for the purpose of making preliminary examinations and surveys, with the view to the location of lines of magnetic telegraph, and may appropriate so much thereof as may be deemed necessary for the erection and maintenance of its poles, piers, abutments, wires, and other necessary fixtures, and for stations, and the right of way over such lands and adjacent lands sufficient to enable it to construct and repair its lines. But no such company shall, without the consent of the owner thereof in writing, enter any building or edifice, or use or appropriate any part thereof, or erect any telegraph pole, pier, or abutment in any yard, or in any inclosure within which an edifice is situated, nor erect any telegraph pole, pier, abutment, wires, or other fixtures so near to any edifice as to occasion injury thereto, or risk of injury in case such pole, pier, or abutment be overthrown, nor injure or destroy any fruit or ornamental tree.

The sections of the United States statutes cited give to any telegraph company organized under the laws of any state the right to construct, maintain, and operate lines of telegraph over and along any of the military or post roads of the United States, but the lines must not interfere with the ordinary travel on such roads; and before any company can exercise any of the powers or privileges conferred such company shall file its written acceptance with the postmaster general of the restrictions and obligations required by law. A later section declares "That all public roads and highways, while kept up and maintained as such, are hereby declared to be post routes."

It is apparent that the only limitation expressed upon the right to maintain lines of telegraph upon the public highways is that they shall be so constructed as not to interfere with the public use of the highway. But the statute nowhere undertakes to deal with the private right of ownership in the highways, and the question arises whether it was the legislative purpose to give rights to telegraph companies inconsistent with the rights of the owner of adjoining lands in the highways.

Whatever may be the rule in other states, we have supposed that the question of the right in the highway of a land owner whose title extends to the center of the road, is not an open one in Ohio. The question has been the subject of adjudication in a score of cases decided by this court, notably in the following: Bingham v. Doane, 9 Ohio, 167; Crawford v. Delaware, 7 Ohio St. 459; Cincinnati & S. G. A. R. Co. v. Cumminsville, 14 Ohio St. 528; Hatch v. Cincinnati & I. R. Co. 18 Ohio St. 128; McClelland v. Miller, 28 Ohio St. 502; Lawrence R. Co. v. Williams, 35 Ohio St. 168; Lawrence R. Co. v. O'Harra, 48 Ohio St. 848.

Perhaps the principle is not better stated than in Lawrence R. Co. v. Williams, supra, opinion by Gilmore, Ch. J., as follows:

"As between the public and the owner of land upon which a common highway is established, it is settled that the public has a right to improve and use the public highway in the manner and for the purposes contemplated at the time it was established. The right to improve includes the power to grade, bridge, gravel, or plank the road in such a manner as to make it most convenient and safe for use by the public, for the purposes of travel and transportation in the customary manner, which is well understood to be by the locomotion of man and beast and by vehicles drawn by animals, without fixed tracks or rails to which such vehicles are confined when in motion. These constitute the easement which the public acquires by appropriating land for the right of way for a highway, and these, in legal contemplation, are what the owner is to receive compensation for when his land is appropriated for this purpose. The fee of the land remains in the owner; he is taxed upon it; and when the use or easement in the public ceases, it reverts to him free from incumbrance.

"In the exercise of the right of eminent domain, the state, through the general assembly, may delegate to a railroad corporation the power to appropriate a right of way for its road along and upon a public highway. . . . In such case, the rights of the public, and the rights of the owner, are entirely distinct; and the consent, express or implied, of one to the appropriation, would not bind or affect the rights of the other. . . . The railroad company, by occupying the highway, constructing its track, and operating its trains thereon by steam motive power, completely diverted the highway from the uses and purposes for which it was established. This new use, to which the highway has been diverted, imposes burdens on the land that are entirely different from, and in addition to, those that were imposed by the highway. The right to so divert the use, and impose additional burdens on the land, could only be acquired by the corporation by agreement with the owner, or by appropriating and making compensation therefor, in the mode prescribed by law."

Applying the doctrine of this holding to the case at bar, it is manifest that the learned trial judge did not err in his charge bearing upon the property right of Mr. Taylor in the highway, but that, on the contrary, the law upon that subject was correctly stated to the jury. And, if right upon that point, the result would seem to follow, as further charged by the judge, that the land owner "had the right to have the trees remain and grow there without injury, whether such injury was necessary or not to the use of the lines of such telegraph company." The rule of law rests upon the clear ground that the appropriation of the public highways for the purpose of telegraph lines was a new use. The highways were originally dedicated for the purposes of public travel, and not for the purpose of telegraph lines. Hence the new use imposed an additional burden. The statutes of Ohio grant to telegraph companies secondary and subordinate, rather than co-ordinate, rights, with travelers, which fact is apparent in the provision that the lines are to be so constructed as not to interfere with the public use of the highways. Cincinnati Inclined Plane R. Co. v. City & Suburban Teleg. Assn. 48 Ohio St. 890. The presence in the statute of provision for the protection of private rights where lines are built on private lands, and the absence of such provision where the highways are used, is strong indication, as it seems to us, that the purpose was to avoid any interference with the rights of the adjoining land owner. And the conclusion seems inevitable, taking the language of the entire statute upon the subject, that, whatever grant of right in the highways is given telegraph companies as against the public, no right is attempted to be given them as against individuals. The question of legislative power, therefore, to authorize a telegraph company to take the interest of the adjoining land owner in the highway without compensation, need not be considered.

It follows that before the telegraph company could possess a right in such measure as to interfere with the right of the land owner in the highway it would be required to acquire that right in some one of the ways known to the law. It is not pretended that any such method has been resorted to. Hence, the entry upon the land by the company, was, as to such right, not a rightful entry. There was no error, therefore, in the trial judge giving the instruction upon that subject already quoted.

The court also said to the jury "that in doing these acts, if these men in good faith honestly thought from the circumstances that they had the right to cut the trees as they did, they could not within the meaning of the law be held to be guilty of a crime in this case, even though they had no right or lawful authority so to do; however, if you find they acted heedlessly, recklessly and carelessly, without honestly believing they had the right to do it, then as to this branch of the case they would be liable." And this is assigned as error, because, as is urged, if the defendants honestly, though mistakenly, believed they had a right to cut the trees, the question of recklessness would not enter into the consideration, and they could not be guilty. We see no error in this instruction to the jury. Indeed it is probably more favorable to the defendants than they could well ask. If, with the information from Mr. Taylor, as to his ownership of the land and of the trees, and in the face of his protest, they chose to go on and do the injury complained of, it was for the jury to say whether or not they acted "heedlessly, recklessly and carelessly," and if they did so act, then the cutting was "wrongful," within the meaning of the statutes. That the cutting, if it injured the tree, would inflict pecuniary injury on Mr. Taylor was apparent on the face of things. The trees were of value to the enjoyment of the property. Not only as a matter of sentiment on the part of the owner who had planted them and had watched their growth for near half a century, but as an improvement which added money value to the farm, had Mr. Taylor an interest in preserving them from injury, and in invoking the aid of the criminal law, where the superior force of the telegraph company made it impracticable for him to personally protect his own. That, too, was the time for him to stand for his own. The right in the company, if it existed, to set poles as near as one hundred and thirty feet from one another, with cross-arms six feet in length, and to put upon them fourteen wires, implied the right to place the poles as near together as the company might desire, and to put on them cross-arms of any length, and string a corresponding number of wires. And if there was the right to cut branches where necessary to the working of the line, there would arise an equal right to cut down the trees themselves in case a like necessity appeared. The land owner made resistance so soon as his property rights were directly assailed, but he did not resist any too soon.

It is contended that the claim of the telegraph company to lawful possession as an instrument of interstate commerce is sustained by the holding of the Supreme Court in Pensacola Teleg. Co. v. Western Union Teleg. Co. 96 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 708. In that case it is held that the powers conferred upon congress to regulate commerce among the several states, and to establish post-offices and post-roads, are not confined to the instrumentalities of commerce, or of the postal service known or in use when the constitution was adopted, but keep pace with the progress of the country, and were intended for the government of the business to which they relate at all times and under all circumstances, and it is the duty of congress to take care that intercourse among the states and the transmission of intelligence are not obstructed or unnecessarily incumbered by state legislation. And further, that the Act of July 24, 1866 (sec. 5263 et seq.) which declares that the erection of telegraph lines shall, as against state interference, be free to all who accept its terms and conditions, and that a telegraph company of one state shall not, after accepting them, be excluded by another state from prosecuting its business within her jurisdiction, is a legitimate regulation of commercial intercourse among the states, and is not limited in its operation to such military and post-roads as are upon the public domain. And, as conclusion, that the statute of Florida, so far as it grants to the Pensacola company the exclusive right of establishing and maintaining lines of electric telegraph as therein specified, is in conflict with that act, and therefore inoperative as against a corporation of another state entitled to the privileges which that act confers; and, further, that a telegraph company of another state, which has secured the right of way by private arrangement with the owner of the land, and duly accepted the restrictions and obligations required by that act, cannot be excluded by the Pensacola company.

But this is very far from holding that a telegraph company which accepts the terms of the United States statute thereby acquires any right as against the individual property right of the citizen. True, the holding is that the telegraph is an instrument of interstate commerce; that telegraph companies are subject to the regulating powers of congress, in respect to their foreign and interstate business, and that such a company occupies the same relation to commerce as a carrier of messages, that a railroad company does as a carrier of goods. But how does this advance the argument? It is made plain, we think, by what has preceded that the state cannot grant to a railroad company any right in a public highway which invades the individual right of the owner of adjoining land; such right may be acquired by due process of law; it cannot be legally seized by brute force. It is to be noted, also, that the Western Union Company whose right is vindicated by the decision cited, "had secured a right of way by private arrangement with the owner of the land," and hence the property rights of the citizen were in no way involved in the case. So solicitous, however, was the eminent jurist who wrote the opinion (Chief Justice Waite) that no unwarranted impression should be created, that he took pains to guard against it, when speaking of the statute, by use of the following language: "It gives no foreign corporation the right to enter upon private property without the consent of the owner and erect the necessary structures for its business; but it does provide that, whenever the consent of the owner is obtained, no state legislation shall prevent the occupation of post-roads for telegraph purposes by such corporations as are willing to avail themselves of its privileges."

No question arises as to the authority of congress to provide for the appropriation of private property to the uses of the telegraph, for no such attempt has been made. The use of public property alone is granted. If private property is required, it must, so far as the present legislation is concerned, be obtained by private arrangement with its owner. No compulsory proceedings are authorized. State sovereignty under the constitution is not interfered with. Only national privileges are granted."

It is manifest that the case is not an authority supporting the contention of the plaintiff in error.

Beyond this it is urged that, by not resisting the erection of the poles and the stringing of the wires when the line was placed along the highway some ten years before, Mr. Taylor is, in some way, estopped from now asserting his private rights, and hence it could not be made a criminal offense to invade those rights. Goodin v. Cincinnati & W. Canal Co. 18 Ohio St. 169, 98 Am. Dec. 95, is cited in support of this contention. The doctrine of the Goodin Case was held in Cleveland & M. R. Co. v. Robbins, 35 Ohio St. 488, to "rest upon its own peculiar facts, and is not to be extended," and in the recent case of Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. v. Perkins, 49 Ohio St. 331, it is again observed, respecting the same case, that "what is there said must be confined to the facts of that case." If, however, the doctrine of the Goodin Case be at all applicable to the facts of the case at bar, it would only prevent a proceeding on the part of the land owner to compel a removal of the line. It could not work a transfer of the right of the land owner in the road to the telegraph company. That result, by reason of mere acquiescence, could not be accomplished short of twenty-one years. The private right, therefore, would not be extinguished. And, if not extinguished, that property right was still susceptible of protection by the criminal law. But, aside from this, even if the Goodin Case applies here, why should the land owner be estopped? The holding in the Goodin Case proceeds upon the theory that the owners must have been fully aware of the appropriation proceedings, and that their property was being seized and despoiled, and upon the additional fact that large sums had been expended on the faith of their apparent acquiescence. In the case at bar it is not shown that at the time of the erection of the telegraph line the danger of interference with, or injury to, private property, was apparent, nor that expense has been incurred relying upon apparent acquiescence, nor, indeed, that any large sum has been expended at all.

Our conclusion is that the owner of the adjoining land was the owner of the trees, and had the right to their full enjoyment subject only to the convenience of public travel; that his property in the trees was a legitimate subject of protection by state legislation, and that the criminal arm of the law was properly invoked for his protection.

Other questions are argued, but we find none presented by the record of sufficient gravity to justify the use of time and space in their discussion.

Lampkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the petition of Henry B. King et al., stockholders of the Port Royal & Augusta Railway Company, the judge below appointed one Averill permanent receiver of the railway and other assets of the company in the state of Georgia, and granted an injunction restraining the Central Railroad & Banking Company of Georgia, until further order, from operating the Port Royal & Augusta Railway, or voting certain stocks and bonds held or controlled by the Central, or in any manner interfering with the property, assets, or management of the Port Royal Railway. To this action of the court both companies excepted. The following facts appeared on the hearing: On the 21st day of December, 1857, the state of South Carolina granted a charter to the Port Royal Railroad Company, whose purpose was to construct a line of railway from the waters of Port Royal harbor, in that state, to Augusta, in the state of Georgia. Afterwards, on the 19th day of December, 1859, the general assembly of this state passed "an act to charter the Port Royal Railroad," the preamble and first section of which act were in the following words: "Whereas, the legislature of South Carolina has, by public statute, incorporated a company to build a railroad from the waters of Port Royal harbor, in the neighborhood of Beaufort, to the Savannah river, in the direction of the city of Augusta, and it is deemed proper to confer upon the same company corporate powers in Georgia, and to grant the right to construct the portion of railroad in this state: Be it therefore enacted," etc., "that such persons as may be made a body corporate by the public law of South Carolina to build a railroad between Port Royal and Augusta are hereby created a body politic in this state; and they shall have the right to continue and construct their road from the boundary between the two states, by the nearest and most practicable route, to the city of Augusta; provided, that they shall cross the river at or below Augusta, by a drawbridge; and provided, there shall be created thereby no obstruction to the free navigation of the Savannah river and its branches." Acts 1859, p. 324.

After the railroad was built, it was sold at judicial sale, and the purchasers thereof filed certificates in the offices of the secretaries of state of both Georgia and South Carolina, incorporating themselves as the "Port Royal & Augusta Railway Company." The entire length of the railroad is 112 miles, of which there are within the limits of the state of Georgia about three and half miles only, the remainder of the line lying wholly within the state of South Carolina. Before the appointment of Averill as receiver, and the granting of the injunction by his honor, Judge Roney, Averill had, under proceedings instituted in the court of common pleas for the county of Beaufort, in the state of South Carolina, been appointed receiver of the Port Royal & Augusta Railway Company of that state; and all its property therein had, by virtue of this appointment, been placed under his management and control. An effort had been made to transfer the litigation over this company and its property to the United States court in that state, concerning which there seemed to be a difference of opinion between the state and federal judges, but as to which the United States judge had not fully made up his mind. He had, however, passed an order directing that Averill, the receiver of the state court, remain in possession and control of the property until a final decision upon the question of removal should be made by him. The foregoing is a brief summary of all the facts which we deem material to a proper disposition of the case now presented for our determination.

It will thus be seen that, without reference to the question of a possible conflict of jurisdiction between the state and federal courts of South Carolina, Averill, when Judge Roney acted, was, under the authority of both these courts, rightfully in possession of, and exercising control over, all the property of the Port Royal Company lying in the state of South Carolina. In the exercise of his discretion, Judge Roney appointed Averill receiver of the property of the company situated in the state of Georgia, and he thus secured the management and control of the entire property of the company in both states. The record before us is voluminous, and, in the argument of the case, a large number of important and interesting questions, both of law and of fact, were raised and discussed by the learned counsel on both sides. We deem it unnecessary, however, to go into them, because, in our judgment, the case, so far as we may properly deal with it, is really a very simple one. It is a most obvious proposition that a railway cannot be successfully and profitably operated when cut up into sections or fragments, and a different person placed in control of each. Indeed, it would hardly be possible for the business of a railway thus dismembered to be properly carried on at all; and undoubtedly it would greatly embarrass the management of the greater part of a line of railway if a small fragment of it, at one of its termini, was under different, and perhaps antagonistic, control. The present case affords such an instance; for, although, as before stated, the line of the Port Royal & Augusta Railway extends for a distance of 112 miles, scarcely more than three and half miles of that line are within the limits of this state. Nevertheless, this small fragment is none the less important to the successful operation of the whole line than were it many more miles in extent, for it serves as a connecting link, and enables the company to reach Augusta,—an essential terminal point, because affording connections with other lines of railway. Certainly, in any view of this case, considerations of economy, safety, and efficiency dictate and demand that the entire property and business of the company should be under one and the same management. Surely it cannot be denied that it is best for the interests of all concerned, whether stockholders, creditors, patrons, or the public generally, that the small fraction of the line located in this state should be used and worked in connection and in harmony with the main line of the road, and this could be successfully accomplished only in the manner indicated. That the South Carolina company was the main corporation, and that the Georgia corporation was merely ancillary to it, is clearly shown by the language used by the legislature in the preamble and first section of the Georgia charter, already quoted in the above statement of facts. It is clear, we think, that the courts of South Carolina are best entitled to entertain and exercise jurisdiction over the affairs of this corporation in their present complicated state; and so long as those courts, by the hands of a receiver, continue in possession of the main body of the road and its property, it would, in our judgment, be unwise and improper to fetter and embarrass that receiver by depriving him of control over so much of the company's property as lies within the state of Georgia. There can be no question, we think, that, instead of so doing, the courts of this state should take such action as will leave him with full authority to manage the entire property. This is true, not merely upon the doctrine of comity of states, but also because it is manifestly the best course to be pursued in the premises. We would be going an extreme length to hold that the trial judge abused his discretion in passing the order complained of. Not only was there no abuse of discretion, but the action taken by him was eminently wise and proper. It will be within his power, in the future, to give such direction and pass such orders as may become necessary to carry into effect the policy herein outlined with regard to the property and control of this company. If the company should hereafter be reinstated in the possession of that part of its property located in South Carolina, it will then be time enough to make the proper application for a like reinstatement of the company in possession and control of its property located in Georgia; and, should this contingency arise, the company will doubtless be granted appropriate and effectual relief.

"Irrespective of the question whether a dog is or is not 'private property,' the willful and malicious killing of one is not an indictable offense under section 4637 of the Code. That section relates to the injury or destruction of inanimate property, and does not apply to injuring or killing animals of any kind.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Banks County to review a judgment convicting defendant of malicious mischief for killing a dog. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. H. Perry and F. M. Johnson for plaintiff in error.

Mr. R. B. Russell, Sol. Gen. for the State.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As will be perceived from the headnote, we have decided this case without reference to the question whether a dog is or is not "private property." It may not, however, be unprofitable to notice how this question has been dealt with in other jurisdictions. In Com. v. MacIn, 8 Leigh, 809, it was, in the general court of Virginia, by a divided bench, decided that a statute making it indictable to knowingly and willfully destroy or injure any tree, or other timber, or property real or personal, belonging to another, did not authorize a criminal prosecution for the killing of a dog. In the case of State v. Harriman, 75 Me. 562, 46 Am. Rep. 428, it was held that dogs were not recognized in law as belonging to the class denominated "domestic animals," and, consequently, that a demurrer to an indictment founded upon a statute providing for the killing or wounding of "domestic animals" ought to have been sustained. In a dissenting opinion by Appleton, Ch. J., in that case, he eulogized the dog in the following language: "He is a domestic animal. From the time of the pyramids to the present day, from the frozen pole to the torrid zone, wherever man has been, there has been his dog. Cuvier has asserted that the dog was, perhaps, necessary for the establishment of civil society, and that a little reflection will convince us that barbarous nations owe much of their civilization above the brute to the possession of the dog. He is the friend and companion of his master, accompanying him in his walks; his servant, aiding him in his hunting; the playmate of his children; an inmate of his house, protecting it against all assailants." And later on the chief justice quoted approvingly the following poetic tribute to dogs:

They are honest creatures,
And ne'er betray their masters, never fawn
On any they love not.

On the other hand, in Wilson v. Wilmington & M. R. Co., 10 Rich. L. 52, Munro, J., alluded to the dog as an animal whose nature is carnivorous, and who is prompted by instinct and appetite to roam at large in the forest in the pursuit of game, or upon a sheep-killing expedition; and finally stigmatized him as a "yelping cur," whose presence upon a railroad track should not arrest in its progress a train of cars freighted with products or passengers. In United States v. Gideon, 1 Minn. 292 (Gil. 235), it was decided that the malicious killing of a dog was not an indictable offense under a statute providing that "every person who shall willfully and maliciously kill, maim, or disfigure any horses, cattle, or other beasts, of another person, shall be punished, etc." Turning now to the "Old North State," it was held in Latham's Case, 35 N. C. 33, that an indictment for malicious mischief in killing a dog would lie. In this case no statute upon which the prosecution could be sustained was mentioned. In Indiana it was held in State v. Sumner, 2 Ind. 377, that the malicious killing of a dog was an indictable offense, under a statute providing that every person who shall maliciously destroy any property shall be fined, etc. This ruling was followed in the later case of Kinsman v. State, 77 Ind. 132. In New Hampshire in the case of State v. McDuffie, 34 N. H. 533, 69 Am. Dec. 516, it was held that under a statute providing for the punishment of any willful and malicious act, whereby any tree, or the real or personal estate, of another should be injured, an indictment would lie for the willful and malicious killing of a dog. It will thus be seen that in other states, under statutes varying in their terms, the question whether a dog is such property as to be the subject of a prosecution for malicious mischief has been decided both ways. Those who may be interested in further investigating the status of the dog as property may consult with profit: Dodson v. Mock, 20 N. C. 141, 33 Am. Dec. 677; Perry v. Phipps, 32 N. C. 259, 51 Am. Dec. 387; Harrington v. Miles, 11 Kan. 480, 15 Am. Rep. 355; Parker v. Mize, 27 Ala. 480, 62 Am. Dec. 776; Wheatley v. Harris, 4 Sneed, 469, 70 Am. Dec. 258; Jemison v. Southeastern Railroad, 75 Ga. 444, 58 Am. Rep. 476, and the numerous authorities cited in these cases, and notes to the same.

Before discussing the ground upon which we have based our decision in the present case, we will remark that we do not think it probable the legislature of this state ever regarded the dog as being, in a general sense, property, concerning which a criminal offense could be committed. After provision is made in the sixth division, title 1, of the Penal Code, for the indictment and punishment of larcenies of various domestic animals, section 4402 provides as follows: "All other domestic animals which are fit for food, and also a dog, may be subjects of a simple larceny; and any person or persons who shall steal any such animal or animals shall be punished," etc. If a dog had been considered as property, as are domestic animals fit for food, it is not likely that it would have been deemed necessary to provide specially that the stealing of one should be simple larceny; and we find nothing in our criminal statutes suggesting any reason why this animal should be regarded as a subject-matter of crime in any instance where it is not expressly so declared. But whether a dog be property or not, we are convinced, after considerable deliberation, that the willful and malicious killing of one is not an indictable offense under section 4627 of the Code, upon which the indictment in this case was based. In section 4612, the legislature undertook to deal with animals the maiming or killing of which it intended to make indictable. As this section originally stood, it was indictable to maliciously kill a hog; but not indictable to maliciously maim one; and the legislature saw proper, by an act passed in 1881 (Acts 1880-81, p. 73), to make this latter act indictable also, so that now it is malicious mischief either to maliciously maim or to kill any of the animals mentioned or designated in that section. It does not in its terms expressly include dogs, and we are satisfied it was never intended by the legislature that the provisions of this section should apply to the dog. The word "maim" does not include any injuries to animals, not causing death, which exceed or fall short of technical maiming. This court, in Bailey v. State, 65 Ga. 410, distinctly held that the word "maim," as used in this section, was intended to be understood in its technical signification, and, consequently, that the mere shooting of a cow was not rendered criminal by the statute. In the chapter of the Penal Code relating to fraudulent or malicious mischief there are numerous sections which relate to the destruction or injuring of inanimate property. Section 4605 relates to tearing, burning, or in any other way destroying any deed, etc.; section 4607 to cutting down, removing, or destroying any beacon or buoy; section 4611 to injuring or destroying bridges, etc.; section 4613 to injuring or destroying turnpike gates, etc.; section 4615 to injuring or destroying trees. These instances are not exhaustive, but will be sufficient to illustrate our meaning. The words "destroy" and "injure" are appropriate when used with reference to offenses committed upon inanimate things; but, as has already been seen, when providing what should be malicious mischief as to living animals, the words "maim" and "kill" were used in section 4612, and in that section we find neither the word "injure" nor the word "destroy." In section 4627 the words "injuring" and "destroying" are used. We think, in the first place, that section 4612 was intended to be exhaustive of the classes of animals upon which the offense of malicious mischief could be committed, and that no act is indictable under that section except the "maiming" or "killing" of one of the animals therein specified or designated; and, also, that the words "all other acts of willful or malicious mischief . . . not herein enumerated," as used in section 4627, were not intended to refer to acts done to animals of any kind; and, secondly, that the words "injuring or destroying any other public or private property," as used in the section last mentioned, were intended to apply exclusively to inanimate property. If the willful and malicious killing of a dog would be indictable under that section, it is obvious that the willful and malicious injuring of one would also be indictable. We have already seen, in Bailey's Case, supra, that the injuring of a cow, otherwise than by maiming, was not criminal under section 4612 of the Code. Under this decision, it would necessarily follow that the injuring of a horse, however badly it might disable or disfigure him, would not be indictable under that section, unless the injury amounted to maiming. If, therefore, the contention of the state in this case is sound, the mere injuring of a worthless, bobtailed, benchlegged sice, if done maliciously, would be malicious mischief, as has been shown, it would not be malicious mischief but wanton cruelty to grossly mar the appearance and beauty of the most magnificent and valuable blooded horse in the state. Sustaining the position held by the state would inevitably lead to the above result, and its absolute absurdity demonstrates that it could never have been intended by the law-making power. The demurrer to the indictment, alleging that it set forth no crime against the laws of this state, ought to have been sustained; and, as this was not done, the judgment, after conviction, ought to have been arrested.

Arthur L. CARTER

Thomas THORSON, Secretary of State.

(.....S. Dak.....)

*1. Chapter 99. Laws of 1891. divides the public printing of the state into classes, and directs the secretary of state, as ex officio commissioner of public printing, to advertise for bids for doing the same, and to make contracts with the best and lowest bidders for doing such printing as the state may require. Held, that a contract so made does not "incur an indebtedness" on the part of the state, within the meaning of section 9, article 11, of the Constitution, prohibiting the incurring of indebtedness "except in pursuance of an appropriation for the specific purpose first made."

2. Such contract imposes no obligation upon the state to have any work done, but in effect, simply designates the parties who are entitled to do whatever work of these several classes the state may require, and fixes the compensation therefor, if any shall be so required and done.

3. Except as made by the constitution itself, the legislative department alone has power to make appropriations from the state treasury for the payment of state indebtedness.

4. The primary thought and purpose of said section 9, article 11, prohibiting the incurring of indebtedness, except in pursuance of appropriations, was to confine the creation of indebtedness to such subjects and to such amounts as were expressly approved by that department of the government which would be required to provide for its payment.

stances could this provision be held to control the power of the legislature to incur or to direct the incurring of indebtedness. —It is held that such provision was not intended to, and consequently does not, prevent the legislature from incurring, or immediately directing the incurring of indebtedness for the usual and current administration of state affairs without first having made an appropriation for the specific purpose.

APPLICATION for a writ of prohibition to prevent the defendant from letting contracts for the state printing. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. W. Carter for plaintiff.

Mr. John L. Pyle, with Mr. Coe L. Crawford, Atty. Gen., for defendant.

The language of the constitution is, "No indebtedness shall be incurred." The word "incur" is held to mean "to become liable or subject to."

See 10 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 398.

An "indebtedness" is a pecuniary obligation.

Id. 399.

But the state contends that this "indebtedness, is not "incurred" until some work has been performed at the request of some officer or tribunal of the state requiring printing to be done. The performance of such work might create an obligation on the part of the state to pay but could not under many authorities be held to constitute an indebtedness within the meaning of the constitution.

Where a statute provides that a specific thing shall be done and paid for, and points out the method of ascertaining the amount, and directs that a warrant shall be issued for the same, this is a sufficient appropriation of the amount within the meaning of the constitution.

Kellam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an application to this court for a writ of prohibition enjoining defendant, as secretary of state and ex officio commissioner of public printing, from letting contracts for the public printing for the state under chapter 99, Laws 1891. It is unnecessary to refer in detail to the statements of the petition for this writ, for it is conceded by both sides that the allowance or disallowance of the writ must depend upon whether, under our constitution, the legislature can empower the secretary to make such contract until an appropriation is made to pay for the work which may be done under it. The law referred to divides the public printing of the state into five classes, and authorizes the secretary of state, as ex officio commissioner of public printing, to advertise for proposals to do the same and to make contracts for such work with the best and lowest bidders. The five classes are as follows: "First class. Printing and binding all bills for the two houses of the legislature and such resolutions, petitions, and memorials as are required to be printed for daily use of the legislative assembly. Second class. Printing and binding the journals of the two houses of the legislature and such reports, communications, and other documents as enter into and make up the journals. Third class. Printing and binding of reports of state officers, of penal and charitable, educational and other public institutions and other documents ordered by the legislature, together with the executive documents and legislative manual. Fourth class. Printing and binding general laws and joint resolutions, revised codes and supreme court reports. Fifth class. Printing of circulars and blanks for state officers and all other printed matter not in pamphlet form and not included in the foregoing classes." The secretary has duly advertised and received and opened bids, and, being about to make contracts with the successful bidders, this writ of prohibition is sought, forbidding the making of such contracts, on the sole ground that, no "appropriation for the specific purpose" of meeting the expense of such printing having been made, the secretary could not, without violating the express injunction of the constitution, make such contracts on the part of the state. The constitutional prohibition relied upon by plaintiff is contained in section 9, article 11, of the Constitution, and is as follows: "No indebtedness shall be incurred, or money expended by the state, and no warrant shall be drawn upon the state treasurer, except in pursuance of an appropriation for the specific purpose first made. The legislature shall provide by suitable enactment for carrying this section into effect."

It is conceded that the secretary is proceeding in strict pursuance of the terms of the law, but, as already intimated, plaintiff's contention is that to make such enactment a valid operative law, carrying authority to the secretary, was beyond the power of the legislature, unless, prior to or simultaneously with its passage, they also make an appropriation for the specific purpose of defraying any indebtedness that might be incurred under it; and so an important question is, Has the legislature, by this law, attempted to empower the secretary to incur an indebtedness on the part of the state?

The law, by section 2, fixes a schedule of maximum prices for the several kinds of work enumerated in the five classes. Section 3 makes the secretary ex officio commissioner of public printing, with power to supervise and measure the work, and adjust the accounts for doing the same; section 4 requires him to advertise for bids or proposals to do the work covered by the five classifications, and to make contracts therefor with the lowest and best bidders, and section 5 provides that on the assembling of the legislature he shall submit to that body estimates of the probable cost of the printing for the ensuing two years. The purpose of the law is plain, and its procedure orderly and business like; and neither should be defeated, unless in contravention of the rule of the constitution. The objection is, and probably can be urged, only as to the work included in the first, second, and fourth classes; that covered by the third and fifth classes being provided for in the General Appropriation Act of 1893, except as to the item of supreme court reports, which will be specially noticed later. It will thus be seen that the work, the payment for which no appropriation has been made, is that which is to come immediately and directly from the legislature next to meet; but neither as to this, nor that of either of the other classes, does the contract which the secretary is authorized to make assume to create an indebtedness against the state. It simply determines and provides who shall do, and be entitled to do, the work, in either class, that may be required, and what prices shall be paid for it, if done. The making of such a contract does not incur an indebtedness. We are referred to no constitutional or statutory requirement that the reports of state officers, or the other items enumerated in classes 3 and 5, shall be printed; and surely the legislature may do as it pleases about printing its bills introduced, and its daily journals, except as the latter are required by the constitution to be published "from time to time." This provision, being constitutional, would not yield to the requirement for an antecedent appropriation. The legal effect of making such contract is hardly more than to designate a public printer of the different classes of work named. It confers upon the contractor the right to do all the work, at the prices designated, which the state requires, of the kind designated in his contract; and, upon the state, the right to have so done such work as it may require. It thus fixes the relation of the parties, and their respective rights and duties, and may prove the foundation upon which an indebtedness growing out of further facts may finally rest; but we do not think it incurs an indebtedness, within the meaning of this constitutional prohibition.

There is, however, another view which we are disposed to take of this constitutional provision. The form of this prohibition is very suggestive of at least its primary purpose and scope. No indebtedness must be incurred, unless in pursuance of an appropriation previously made. Does this mean that the legislature itself can involve the state in no indebtedness for any purpose, unless, before doing so, it has made an appropriation for that specific purpose? Might the secretary of state, or an employé of the legislature, properly ignore a legislative direction, legal in form, to supply their chambers with thermometers, or clocks, or window shades, or ventilating appliances, because no appropriation for the same had first been made? With the legislature rests the right and the duty of determining within constitutional limits, when, and for what purposes the public moneys of the state shall be paid out. Within such limits, their judgment is supreme. What they approve and appropriate for must be paid, and, except as provided in the constitution, nothing else can be paid. In this respect all other departments and agents of the state are subordinate to them. We think the primary thought and purpose of this provision were to prohibit any other department, officer, or agent of the state from involving the state in any expense or indebtedness which the legislature had not previously approved and authorized by an appropriation. It was intended to keep the indebtedness of the state, and the power to incur indebtedness, strictly within and under the control of that department which would be required to provide for its payment. It was not only appropriate and reasonable, but apparently requisite, that the legislature, to which must be looked for the means to meet indebtedness, should be allowed to control the making of indebtedness. The closing sentence of the section emphasizes this thought,—“The legislature shall provide by suitable enactment for carrying this section into effect.” It would appear that the object of the provision which was immediately in view by the makers of the constitution was thus to be secured, and the prohibition made practically effective, by means of legislation. But the legislature could provide no enactment which would be a check upon or control itself, for what it did or passed it could at any time undo or repeal, either expressly or by implication. The legislature showed its understanding of the meaning of this section, and of its duty under it, by enacting chapter 111 of the Laws of 1891, making it a misdemeanor for any state officer, or other agent of the state, “to create or attempt to create any indebtedness against the state without express authority so to do.” Acting upon this theory, and within the limits of their constitutional power, as they evidently thought, and as we think, they expressly and specifically authorized and directed the secretary of state to make a contract for a year with the best and lowest bidders for such public printing as the state might require, postponing the making of a specific and sufficient appropriation therefor until the indebtedness should be actually created, and its amount known to them. We think the long-term contract which the legislature authorized the secretary to make for the publication of the reports of this court, involves the same question. By express direction of the legislature the contract runs until October 1, 1898, and yet no appropriation was made, except for the then ensuing two years. The fact that a confessedly partial and inadequate appropriation was made would not, it seems to us, satisfy the principle upon which plaintiff's contention must rest, to wit, the unconstitutionality of the incurrence of an indebtedness, no provision for the payment of which had first been made. So far as the particular question here discussed is concerned, we entertain no doubt of the validity of either contract. Without undertaking to say that under no circumstances could this provision be held to affect or control the power of the legislature to incur, or to direct the incurrence of, indebtedness against the state,—a question we leave to be discussed and decided when fairly presented,—we are entirely satisfied that the prohibition was never intended to, and consequently does not, forbid or prevent the legislature from immediately authorizing or directing the incurring of an indebtedness in the current and usual administration of state affairs. This has been the view of the legislature since the organization of the state, and at every session it has directed the purchase of articles of convenience, on the credit of the state, without an appropriation having first been made. To hold that this section of the constitution prohibits the legislature from doing this would, we think, be to construe and use it as it was never intended to be construed and used, but the interpretation which would allow indebtedness to be so incurred would certainly allow the making of the contracts challenged by plaintiff.

*Headnotes by HORTON, Ch. J.

NOTE.—Entries in bank book as contracts.

The authorities all seem to agree that an entry in a bank pass-book is not a contract, and also that it has some weight as evidence, but there is a slight diversity of opinion as to how far it is conclusive evidence.

The majority of the cases may perhaps be said to hold that the entry is made a receipt, in other words that entries in a pass-book are only prima facie evidence against the banker. Commercial Bank of Scotland v. Rhind, 1 Macq. H. L. Cas. 443.

In Com. v. Reading Sav. Bank, 133 Mass. 16, 43 Am. Rep. 495, it is said "that as between the depositor and the bank it may be shown that an entry in the pass-book is an error and that the depositor is not entitled to receive the sum stated or that it has been paid, or has been taken from the bank by legal process, can hardly be controverted."

In Davis v. Lenawee County Sav. Bank, 53 Mich. 168, it is stated that the bank book is no contract, and is only one of the means of indicating the state of the funds.

The entry may be explained or contradicted by parole evidence. Branch v. Dawson, 36 Minn. 193.

The entry in the pass-book is prima facie evidence that the bank received the amount entered and the burden is on it to overcome such evidence, to defeat a recovery for such amount. Asher v. National Park Bank, 7 Alb. L. J. 43.

The above rules are supported by the transactions which are of such frequent occurrence and from which has been formulated the rule that if a check which is not good is received and the amount credited on the pass-book of the customer, the bank upon discovering the error may charge the amount back to the depositor. National Gold Bank & T. Co. v. McDonald, 51 Cal. 64, 21 Am. Rep. 697.

So when a wrong entry is alleged by the banker to have been made in the pass book and the customer denies the error, the question is one for the jury. Snead v. Williams, 9 L. T. N. S. 115.

In Shaw v. Picton, 4 Barn. & C. 715, 7 Dowl. & R. 301, and Shaw v. Dartnall, 6 Barn. & C. 57, 9 Dowl. & R. 54, agents for the grantees of annuities gave their customers pass-books in which they entered the state of the accounts, and the agents having become bankrupt the question arose as to whether or not the accounts as represented in the books could be disputed, and the court in each instance is alleged, and it is shown by the pleadings, including the allegations in the answer of the defendant, that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, the court may render judgment upon the pleadings, on the motion of the plaintiff.

ERROR to the District Court for Pawnee County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover back the amount which had been paid upon a check which overdrew the drawer's account. Affirmed.

Statement by HORTON, Ch. J.:

April 14, 1890, the First National Bank of Larned, in this state, commenced an action before a justice of the peace in Pawnee county against Harry Talcott, on a check, of which the following is a copy: "The First National allowed them to be explained and varied in the interest of the bankrupt to a certain extent.

Another class of cases have given the entry a much stronger effect than the above.

In Manhattan Co. v. Lydig, 4 Johns. 377, 4 Am. Dec. 280, it is said that if the entry is made at the time of the deposit, it is conclusive on the bank as an original entry.

But it is not conclusive on the depositor. Mechanics & Farmers Bank v. Smith, 19 Johns. 115.

If made at the time of the deposit, it is an original entry which the bank cannot dispute. But if made afterwards the entry may be inquired into. Heppburn v. Citizens Bank of Louisiana, 2 La. Ann. 1007, 46 Am. Dec. 564.

Entries in the pass-book bind the bank as admissions. Wasson v. Lamb, 6 L. R. A. 191, 120 Ind. 514.

The bank must be bound by the entries on the pass-book, in the absence of fraud or collusion. Mechanics & T. Bank v. Banks, 11 La. 290.

But if the entries in the pass-book are made from the ledger and are erroneous, they may be corrected. McLean County Bank v. Mitchell, 58 Ill. 53.

In Featherston v. Norris, 7 S. C. N. S. 472, the question was considered as to the weight of entries in the pass-book as between the depositor and a third person. In this case it was a pass book turned over by an official to his successor, and it was held to be prima facie good as a voucher.

A similar ruling was made in Featherston v. Norris, 14 S. C. 324, and State v. Norris, 15 S. C. 241.

The pass-book may be admissible as between the banker and the depositor, but not as against third persons, unless on some peculiar grounds, as that of original entries in the merchants' account book. Wills Point Bank v. Bates, 72 Tex. 137.

In Union Bank v. Knapp, 3 Pick. 96, 15 Am. Dec. 181, which is sometimes cited upon this subject, the question was as to the effect of balancing of books.

The effect of the entry with reference to the statute of limitations does not seem to have received much attention.

In Locke v. First Nat. Bank of Gonio, 65 N. H. 870, it was held the right of action to recover a deposit was barred in six years. But there is nothing to show that any different period of limitation was provided for written and parole contracts.

Talcott filed an answer, and, for his fourth defense, alleged: "And for a further defense, and as defendant's bill of particulars and set-off, defendant says: That on the 2d day of January, 1885, this defendant opened a running account with said plaintiff, by depositing with said plaintiff the sum of $200, and receiving from said plaintiff a pass-book, in which a receipt for the said sum of $200 was duly entered. A copy of said pass-book is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part hereof. That afterwards, on the 28th day of January, 1885, defendant made another deposit with this said plaintiff, of $200, receiving therefor, as a receipt, a pass book from said plaintiff, in which the said sum of $200 was duly entered as being received by said plaintiff, and credited to defendant. Said account, a copy of said pass-book, marked 'Exhibit B,' is hereto attached, and made a part hereof. That afterwards, on the 28th day of September, 1885, defendant made another deposit with the said plaintiff, of $103.60. A receipt for said sum of $103.60 plaintiff duly entered in the pass book first given by plaintiff to defendant, as is shown by 'Exhibit A,' heretofore referred to, and attached hereto, and made a part hereof. That defendant drew divers checks from the 2d day of January, 1885, to the 15th of December, 1885, to the amount $302.80, which were duly paid by plaintiff in amounts as is more fully shown and set out in 'Exhibit A,' heretofore referred to, attached hereto, and made a part hereof. That said plaintiff refused, and has at all times refused, to pay this defendant, up till the 17th day of March, 1890, the said balance due him. That on said 17th day of March, 1890, there was due this defendant from said plaintiff the sum of $200.80, with interest thereon from the 15th day of December, 1885, at 7 per cent per annum, amounting to the sum of $59.65, making a total due this defendant of $260.45. That on the said 17th day of March, 1890, defendant drew and presented to plaintiff the check for $200 sued on in this action, and which is set out in plaintiff's bill of particulars and received the money thereon, which said sum of $200 this defendant has applied on the said sum of $260.45 due this defendant from said plaintiff on that said day. That there is now due this defendant a balance on said account of $60.45, with interest from March 17th, 1890, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum until paid."

First National Bank of Larned, Kansas, in Account with Harry Talcott.

The bank filed a reply, pleading the three years' statute of limitations. Before the justice of the peace the bank recovered a judgment of $200. Talcott appealed to the district court. On the 18th of September, 1890, the district court sustained the statute of limitations of three years, and rendered judgment against Talcott upon the pleadings, in favor of the bank, for $210.26. Talcott excepted and brings the case here.

Messrs. H. C. Johns, William G. Fairchild, and Thomas W. Johns, for plaintiff in error:

Talcott's claim was upon a contract in writing and was not barred by the statute of limitations.

It was evidenced by two pass books made by the bank and delivered to him. At the top of the pages it reads:

"Dr. First National Bank, in Account with Harry Talcott, Cr."

Then follows a statement of the items—debts and credits—the amounts deposited and checked out—on opposite pages. This is a contract in writing. It contains all the essential elements of a contract—the names of the parties, showing which is debtor and which creditor, dates and amounts from which a balance is easily struck. The law supplies the rest—fills up the blanks.

Rep. 843, a bill of goods was made on a printed blank with the names of the vendors printed at the top, giving the name of the vendee and list of goods and prices, and it was held a sufficient writing, without more to constitute a "bargain," and in Packard v. Richardson, 17 Mass. 132, 9 Am. Dec. 123, the court says: "A bargain is a contract or agreement," etc.

Where mutual accounts are kept and an account current is rendered of mutual transactions, it "is a contract in writing sufficient under the statute."

Mr. C. N. Sterry, for defendant in error: In the course of business between depositors and banks, it is customary to have a pass-book in which the bank enters the amount received from the depositor at the time of the deposit; or afterwards this entry does not constitute a contract, but simply constitutes an acknowledgment for a receipt on the part of the bank.

1 Morse, Banks & Banking, 3d ed. § 290; Davis v. Lenawee County Sav. Bank, 53 Mich. 163; First Nat. Bank of Union Mills v. Clark, 17 L. R. A. 580, 184 N. Y. 368.

Horton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By section 18 of the Civil Code, it is provided that, "after the cause of action shall have accrued," "an action upon any agreement, contract, or promise in writing" must be brought "within five years," and "an action upon a contract not in writing" "within three years." It is claimed that as the alleged set-off, being evidenced by a bank or pass book, was upon an "agreement, contract, or promise in writing," the statute of three years was no bar. The trial court ruled otherwise. The pass-book was balanced December 15, 1895. This action was commenced April 14, 1890,—more than four years after that date. The authorities are that the entry in a pass-book, "by the proper officer, of the amount and date of the deposit, is prima facie evidence that the bank received the amount, and binds the bank, like any other form of receipt. But the entry is only a receipt, and is open to explanation by evidence aliunde, and if shown to be a mistake, is no longer binding upon the bank. The receipt is also open to correction in favor of the depositor, if it be erroneous."

2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 102, 103, and cases cited; Morse, on Banks & Banking, in volume 1, 3d ed. § 290, says: "A bank book is prima facie evidence, but no more and is open to explanation by parol evidence, for it is not a contract." In Davis v. Lenawee County Sav. Bank, 53 Mich. 163, the court observed that "the bank book is no contract, and is only one of the means of indicating the state of the funds." The reasons why a pass-book given to the depositor, and its entries therein, do not constitute a contract in writing, are fully stated in the authorities cited. See also, Mechanics & Farmers Bank v. Smith, 19 Johns. 116; Asher v. National Park Bank, 7 Alb. L. J. 43; Anderom v. Leverich, 70 Iowa, 741. The case of Jessoy v. Horn, 64 Ill. 379, is not applicable, because in Illinois the statute provides that actions brought upon "evidence of indebtedness in writing" have the same limitation as actions upon contracts in writing. A pass-book is "evidence of indebtedness in writing," but not a contract in writing. As against the ruling of the trial court, the case of Long v. Straus, 107 Ind. 94, 57 Am. Rep. 87, is cited. The action in that case was upon a written instrument in the nature of a certificate of deposit, properly signed by the party executing the same. It was more than a mere receipt, for it embodied an agreement. Elliott, J., speaking for the court, said: "The instrument declared on is a contract. It is a written contract. It cannot be contradicted or varied by parol evidence." "It is by no means certain whether it is not a regular certificate of deposit." "As the contract is a written one, not subject to variation by parol evidence, the agreement to pay the money must exist in it, or not exist at all." Many other cases are referred to, of similar kind, but it would not do to hold that an entry on a deposit slip or in a pass-book is such written contract that all oral negotiations and stipulations are merged in the receipt or writing. First Nat. Bank of Union Mills v. Clark, 184 N. Y. 368, 17 L. R. A. 580.

It is further claimed that within the decision of Waffle v. Short, 25 Kan. 503, there was an open, running, and mutual account between the parties, and that the statute of limitation did not commence to run until after the payment of the check of March 17, 1890. The bill of particulars of the bank did not state any mutual or other account. The action was brought to recover $200 upon the check. The answer and set off alleged that the pass-book was balanced on December 15, 1895. On that date Talcott made a demand upon the bank for the balance he claimed to be due. The statute began to run from the demand. He did not follow up his demand for more than four years. Not until his claim was barred. After the demand of Talcott, on the 15th of December, 1895, and after the statute of limitation had fully run between the parties, there was no open, running, or mutual account existing between them. It is true that Talcott alleged that he applied the $200 upon his account with the bank; but after that account had been closed, and demand had been made, and the statute of limitation had run, neither party had any cause of action thereon.

It is intimated in the brief of plaintiff below that Talcott obtained credit of $200 on his pass-book, to which he was not entitled, but the record does not show this. Talcott's delay in attempting to collect the balance claimed by him until the statute of limitation had run is not explained. When an appeal is taken to the district court from the judgment of a justice of the peace, and full pleadings are filed in that court, the parties are bound thereby; and if it appears from the answer of the defendant that no counterclaim, set off, or other defenses are alleged, and it is shown by the pleadings, including the allegations in the answer of the defendant, that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, the court may render judgment upon the pleadings, on the motion of the plaintiff. Talcott, in his answer, admitted he executed the check, and received from the bank $200 thereon. His answer alleged a set-off barred by the statute of limitation. Therefore, the trial court properly rendered judgment upon the pleadings in favor of the plaintiff below.

The judgment of the District Court will be affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

Re Marilla M. RICKER.

(.....N. H.....)

1. In New Hampshire the legal disabilities of married women have been so far removed that marriage does not disqualify a woman for admission to the bar.
2. The details of the common law as to the appointment of attorneys-at-law are not in force in New Hampshire, being inapplicable to the situation and circumstances of the inhabitants of that state.
3. The requirement of an official oath and a license does not preclude women from being admitted to the bar.
4. An attorney-at-law is not an officer of the government, such that the right of admission to the bar will depend on eligibility to public office.
5. Women are not excluded from admission as attorneys-at-law by the common-law rule which denies them the right to vote or hold public office.

(June, 1890.)

PETITION for permission to practice as an attorney-at-law. Permission granted upon compliance with the requirements.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mmes. Marilla M. Ricker in propria persona, and Lelia J. Robinson for petitioner.

Doe, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

"Any citizen of the age of twenty-one years, of good moral character and suitable qualifications, on application to the supreme court, shall be admitted to practice as an attorney." Gen. Laws, chap. 218, § 2. "The word 'citizen,' when used in its most comprehensive sense, doubtless includes women; but a woman is not, by virtue of her citizenship, vested by the constitution . . . with any absolute right independent of legislation to take part in the government, either as a voter or as an officer, or to be admitted to practice as an attorney. . . The word 'citizen,' in the statute under which this application is made, is but a repetition of the word originally adopted with a view of excluding aliens." Robinson's Case, 181 Mass. 876, 877, 882, 41 Am. Rep. 239. Under a statute like ours, in all respects that are material in the present inquiry, it was held in that case that an unmarried woman is not entitled to be examined for admission as an attorney. The ground of the decision was that by the law of England, which was our law from the first settlement of the country until the American Revolution, no woman could, in person, take an official part in the government of the state, except as queen, or overseer of the poor, without express authority of statute. No case is known in which a woman was admitted to practice as an attorney, solicitor, or barrister. Although an attorney-at-law is not, in the strictest sense, a public officer, he comes very near it. He is required to take the oaths to support the constitutions, and an oath of office, which has remained without substantial change since the time of Lord Holt. By admission he becomes an officer of the court, and holds his office during good behavior, subject to removal. His office concerns the public, for it is for the administration of justice. Whenever the legislature has intended to make a change in the legal rights or capacities of women, it has used words clearly manifesting its intent, and the extent of the change intended. In making innovations upon the long established system of law on this subject, the legislature has proceeded with great caution,—one step at a time. The whole course of legislation precludes the inference that any change in the legal rights or capacities of women is to be implied, which has not been clearly expressed. There has been no legislative or judicial action having any tendency to prove such a change in the law and usage prevailing in 1776 as to admit women to the exercise of any office that concerns the administration of justice. This ground of decision was adopted in Leonard's Case, 12 Or. 93, 58 Am. Rep. 828. The same conclusion was reached in Bradwell's Case, 55 Ill. 535, 537-541, where it was held that authority to license attorneys was derived from a statute. "Although an attorney-at-law," says the court, "is an agent . . . when he has been retained to act for another, yet he is also much more than an agent. He is an officer of the court, holding his commission, in this state, from two members of this court, and subject to be disbarred by this court for what our statute calls 'mal-conduct in his office.' He is appointed to assist in the administration of justice, is required to take an oath of office, and is privileged from arrest while attending court. . . . At the time this statute was enacted, we had, by express provision, adopted the common law of England. . . . Female attorneys-at-law were unknown in England. . . . When the legislature gave to this court the power of granting licenses to practice law, it was with not the slightest expectation that this privilege would be extended equally to men and women. . . . This step, if taken by us, would mean that in the opinion of this tribunal every civil office in this state may be filled by women. . . . The great body of our law rests on ancient usage. . . . The mere fact that women have never been licensed as attorneys-at-law is, in a tribunal where immemorial usage is as much respected as it is and ought to be in courts of justice, a sufficient reason for declining to exercise our discretion in their favor until the propriety of their participating in the offices of state and the administration of public affairs

NOTE.—By the above decision New Hampshire has been added to the constantly growing list of states in which women are accorded the right to admission to practice at the bar. In connection with the great research into the history of the rights and status of attorneys which is exhibited in the above case, see the note to Re Leach (Ind.), 21 L. R. A. 701, in which are collected the modern decisions upon the right of women to admission to the bar and also the late statutes upon that subject.

shall have been recognized by the lawmaking department of the government. . . . If we could disregard in this matter the authority of those unwritten usages which make the great body of our law, we might do so in any other, and the dearest rights of person and property would become a matter of mere judicial discretion."

In Goodell's Case, 39 Wis. 232, 20 Am. Rep. 42, it was held that the statute left the admission of attorneys to the discretion of the court, and a motion to admit Miss Goodell was denied on the ground that it is public policy not to tempt women from the proper duties of their sex by opening to them duties peculiar to ours. The practice of the law, like military service, is not one of the many employments that are fit for women. Discussions are habitually necessary, in courts of justice, which are unfit for female ears. The habitual presence of women at these would tend to relax the public sense of decency and propriety. "If these things are to come, says the court, "we will take no voluntary part in bringing them about."

In Lockwood's Case, 9 Ct. Cl. 346, it was held that admission to the bar is admission to an office which a woman is without legal capacity to hold, and the opinion was expressed that women are as well fitted for military service as for the practice of law. "In cases of misconduct by an attorney," it was said (page 353), he may be attached by the court, and imprisoned; but, if the attorney were a married woman, she might come in, and say that the misconduct occurred in her husband's presence, and that at common law it was by his compulsion. She might misapply the funds of a client, or be guilty of gross neglect or fraud, and the husband be sued at common law for the wrong. In Hall's Case, 50 Conn. 181, 47 Am. Rep. 626, the construction given to a statute by a majority of the court allowed women to be admitted to the bar. Upon re enactments of an old statute, general compilations and revisions, and circumstantial evidence, contextual and extraneous, it seems to have been held that the legislature had changed the law.

The common-law disabilities of a married woman, whose legal existence, for some purposes and to some extent, was merged in that of her husband, may have made it inexpedient that she should be a member of the legal profession. Her application for admission might formerly have been denied on the ground that she "would be bound neither by her express contracts, nor by those implied contracts which it is the policy of the law to create between attorney and client." Bradwell's Case, 55 Ill. 535, 536; Alton v. Gilmanton, 2 N. H. 520; Leighton v. Sargent, 27 N. H. 460, 468-472, 59 Am. Dec. 8-8; Toule v. Hatch, 43 N. H. 270; Varnum v. Martin, 15 Pick. 440; Tarbell v. Dickinson, 8 Cush. 345, 350, 351.

A form of a declaration in assumpsit against an attorney is: "For that whereas, . . . in consideration that the plaintiff . . . had then retained and employed the defendant, as then being an attorney, to prosecute and conduct a certain action, . . . for reasonable fees and reward to be paid by the plaintiff to the defendant, he, the defendant, then promised the plaintiff to use due and proper care and skill; . . . nevertheless, the defendant, not regarding his said promise, did not, nor would, use due and proper care and skill." 1 Saunders, Pl. & Ev. 268.

A married woman, who could defeat such a suit by pleading and proving her coverture at the time of making the contract, might not be a competent attorney. In this state, legal disabilities have been so far removed that marriage does not disqualify a woman for admission to the bar. Gen. Laws, chap. 183, § 12; Laws 1879, chap. 57, § 27; Harris v. Webster, 53 N. H. 481, 483, 484; Laton v. Balcom, 64 N. H. 92, 95; Seaver v. Adams, 66 N. H. 142, 143.

"An act of parliament cannot alter by reason of time, but the common law may, since cesante ratione cessat lex." Potter's Dwar. Stat. 122; Cole v. Lake Co. 54 N. H. 242, 285.

"The constitution . . . vests in the courts all the judicial power of the state. The constitutional establishment of such courts appears to carry with it the power to establish a bar to practice in them, and admission to the bar appears to be a judicial power. It may therefore become a very grave question, for adjudication here, whether the constitution does not intrust the rule of admission to the bar, as well as of expulsion from it, exclusively to the discretion of the courts." Goodell's Case, supra; Spland's Case, 133 Pa. 527, 540.

The constitutional question need not now be considered. If our statute of attorneys is an exercise of legislative power, it makes no change in the common law applicable to this case. It removes none of the legal disabilities of women, and destroys none of their rights. Orr v. Quimby, 54 N. H. 619, 626, 635, 636. If its provisions are not operative as a statute, they have nevertheless been acquiesced in and acted upon, and may well be regarded as having the force of rules of court, for the adoption of which a written order is not necessary. Fullerton v. Bank of U. S. 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 604, 618, 7 L. ed. 280, 284; Duncan v. United States, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 435, 451, 8 L. ed. 739, 745. Independently of any statute, every court of record may make such rules for the transaction of its business as do not contravene the laws of the land. Bacon, Abr. Am. ed. 1868, "Courts of U. S." a. The power is incidental; that is, implied as a means of accomplishing the purpose for which the court is established. Boody v. Watson, 64 N. H. 177. The provision that "the court may from time to time establish rules and orders of practice, consistent with the laws, for conducting and regulating its business, and prescribe forms of proceedings in all cases not provided for" (Gen. Laws, chap. 208, § 6), is an enactment of common law. In the absence of written law establishing a different state of things, authority to make reasonable rules for the admission and removal of members of the bar "is necessarily inherent in every court, in order to enable it to discharge its duties,—as much so as the power to preserve order." Bryant's Case, 24 N. H. 149, 158; Manning v. French, 149 Mass. 391, 393, 399; State v. Winton, 11 Or. 456, 460, 50 Am. Rep. 486; Ex parte Burr, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 529, 531, 6 L. ed. 153.

Griffin v. Thompson, 48 U. S. 2 How. 244, 267, 11 L. ed. 253, 258; King v. Sheriffs of York, 8 Barn. & Ad. 770, 777, 782.

"The relations between the court and the attorneys and counselors who practice in it, and their respective rights and duties, are regulated by the common law; and it has been well settled, by the rules and practice of common-law courts, that it rests exclusively with the court to determine who is qualified to become one of its officers, as an attorney and counselor, and for what cause he ought to be removed." Secombe's Case, 60 U. S. 19 How. 9, 13, 15 L. ed. 565, 566.

"The profession of an attorney and counselor is not like an office created by an act of congress, which depends for its continuance, its powers, and its emoluments upon the will of its creator, and the possession of which may be burdened with any conditions not prohibited by the constitution. Attorneys and counselors are not officers of the United States. They are not elected or appointed in a manner prescribed by the constitution for the election and appointment of such officers. They are officers of the court, admitted as such by its order, upon evidence of their possessing sufficient legal learning and fair private character. . . . The order of admission is the judgment of the court that the parties possess the requisite qualifications as attorneys and counselors, and are entitled to appear as such, and conduct causes therein. From its entry the parties become officers of the court, and are responsible to it for professional misconduct. They hold their office during good behavior, and can only be deprived of it for misconduct ascertained and declared by the judgment of the court after opportunity to be heard has been afforded. Their admission or their exclusion . . . is the exercise of judicial power. . . . The legislature may undoubtedly prescribe qualifications for the office, . . . as it may . . . prescribe qualifications for the pursuit of any of the ordinary avocations of life." Ex parte Garland, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 333, 378, 379, 18 L. ed. 366, 371.

"The court, in some instances, will order an attorney to pay costs to his own client for neglect, or to the opposite party for vexatious or improper conduct. And if a rule be made upon an attorney for the delivery of writings, or payment of costs, etc., and it be not obeyed, the court will enforce it by attachment." 1 Tidd, Pr. 58. At common law an attorney was always liable to be dealt with in a summary way for any ill practice attended with fraud or corruption, and committed against the obvious rules of justice and honesty. No complaint, indictment, or information was ever necessary, as the foundation of such proceedings. Usually, they are commenced by rule to show cause, or by an attachment or summons to answer; but these are issued on motion or bare suggestion to the court, or even on the knowledge which the court may acquire of the doings of an attorney, by their own observation. No formal or technical description of the act complained of is deemed requisite to the validity of such a proceeding. Sometimes they are founded on affidavit of the facts, to which the attorney is summoned to answer; in other cases, by an order to show cause why he should not be stricken from the rolls. And, when the court judicially know of the misconduct of an attorney, they will, of their own motion, order an inquiry to be made by a master, without issuing any process whatever. . . . Nor can a judgment of removal be properly . . . considered as a punishment for a crime or offense." It is not a bar to a criminal prosecution. The power of removal is necessary, "not as a mode of inflicting a punishment for an offense, but in order to enable the courts to prevent the scandal and reproach which would be occasioned to the administration of the law by the continuance in office of those who had violated their oaths or abused their trust, and to take away from such persons the power and opportunity of injuring others by further acts of misconduct and malpractice." Randall's Petition, 11 Allen, 473, 479, 480; Randall v. Brigham, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 523, 539, 540, 19 L. ed. 235, 292, 293; Kimball's Case, 64 Me. 140, 147; Austin's Case, 5 Rawle, 191, 204, 28 Am. Dec. 657; State v. Winton, 11 Or. 456, 466, 50 Am. Rep. 486; Cohen v. Wright, 23 Cal. 293, 320.

The question tried in such a case is "whether, after the conduct of this man, it is proper that he should continue a member of a profession which should stand free from all suspicion;" whether "he is an unfit person to practice as an attorney." Brounsall's Case, Cowp. 829, 830. The issue of fitness for the office of an attorney is as general and comprehensive as the question raised by a petition to the legislature for the removal of a military or judicial officer by address. An adjournment of the hearing, after adverse evidence is received, gives an opportunity for defense, as ample as would be furnished by a formal specification of charges filed before the hearing begins. As attorneys are peculiarly exposed to groundless accusations, and may suffer irreparable injury from a public trial of the question of removal on an order to show cause, even if it ends in their complete vindication (4 Campbell, Ch. Just. 136, 137), such an order is not made unless manifestly required by the public interest. Meuz v. Lloyd, 2 C. B. N. S. 409, 411.

"Barristers or counselors at law, in England, were never appointed by the courts at Westminster, but were called to the bar by the inns of court." Cooper's Case, 23 N. Y. 67, 90. "The original institution of the inns of court nowhere precisely appears, but it is certain that they are not corporations, and have no constitution by charter from the crown. They are voluntary societies, which for ages have submitted to government analogous to that of other seminaries of learning. But all the power they have concerning the admission to the bar is delegated to them from the judges, and in every instance their conduct is subject to their control, as visitors." King v. Benchers of Gray's Inn, 1 Dougl. 353, 354. That case was an application for a mandamus to compel the defendants to call the petitioner, Hart, to the degree of a barrister at law. A mandamus was refused on the ground that the ancient and usual way of redress was by appeal to the twelve judges, as visitors. The power of admission, inherent in courts, having been immemorially exercised by the inns, with the assent of the judges, and subject to their revision, its qualified delegation could be inferred from the circumstances. No one is called to the bar who is not a member of an inn. On the question of admission to an inn, there is no appeal from the benchers. As visitors, the judges have jurisdiction only over actually admitted members of an inn. "This court has no power to compel the benchers of this society to permit any individual to become a member of the society, or to assign any reasons why they do not admit him." Abbott, Oh. J., in Kino v. Benchers of Lincoln's Inn, 4 Barn. & C. 855, 859. "Every individual . . . has not an inchoate right to be admitted a member of any of these societies. They make their own rules as to the admission of members; and, even if they act capriciously upon the subject, this court can give no remedy in such a case, because in fact there has been no violation of any right. This case is analogous to that of a college." Bayley, J., in the same case.

When "the fixing of the court of common pleas, the grand tribunal for disputes of property, to be held in one certain spot," brought the legal profession together, "they naturally fell into a kind of collegiate order, and, being excluded from Oxford and Cambridge, found it necessary to establish a new university of their own. This they did by purchasing at various times certain houses (now called the 'inns of court and of chancery.') . . . Here exercises were performed, lectures read, and degrees were at length conferred in the common law, as at other universities in the canon and civil. The degrees were those of barristers (first styled 'apprentices,' . . .), who answered to our bachelors, as the state and degree of a serjeant . . . did to that of doctor." 1 Bl. Com. 23, 28.

"Of advocates or (as we generally call them) counsel, there are two species or degrees,—barristers and serjeants. The former are admitted after a considerable period of study, or at least standing, in the inns of court. . . . From both these degrees some are usually selected to be his majesty's counsel learned in the law. . . . These king's counsel . . . must not be employed in any cause against the crown without special license. . . . A custom has of late years prevailed of granting letters-patent of precedence to such barristers as the crown thinks proper to honor with that mark of distinction, whereby they are entitled to such rank and preadence as are assigned in their respective patents; sometimes, next after the king's attorney-general, but usually next after his majesty's counsel then being. These . . . rank promiscuously with the king's counsel, and, together with them, sit within the bar of the respective courts, but receive no salaries, and are not sworn, and therefore are at liberty to be retained in causes against the crown. And all other serjeants and barristers indiscriminately (except in the court of common pleas, where only serjeants are admitted), may take upon them the protection and defense of any suitors, whether plaintiff or defendant, who are therefore called their clients, like the dependents upon the ancient Roman orators. Those, indeed, practiced gratis, for honor merely, or, at most for the sake of gaining influence; and so, likewise, it is established with us that a counsel can maintain no action for his fees, which are given, not as locatio vel conductio, but as quiddam honorarium,—not as a salary or hire, but as a mere gratuity. . . . Counsel guilty of deceit or collusion are punishable by Stat. Westminster 1 (8 Edw. I. chap. 28) with imprisonment for a year and a day, and perpetual silence in the courts." 3 Bl. Com. 20-29. This statute did not impair the common-law power, of disbarment delegated by the courts to the inns to which the members of the bar respectively belong, and exercised by them subject to the appellate jurisdiction of the visitors from whom the power was derived. We are told that in the reign of Henry VI. there were ten lesser inns, which were called 'inns of chancery,' each containing at least one hundred students, and some a great many more. These were designed as places of elementary studies. Here they learned the nature of original and judicial writs, which were then considered as the first principles of the law, and for this reason these inns were denominated from the chancery. When young men had made some progress here, and were more advanced in years, then they were admitted into the inns of court. Of these there were four in number. . . . The degree of serjeant at law was considered in a very respectable light. None could be a judge in the king's bench or common pleas, but one who had been first a serjeant, nor was a person to be called to the degree of serjeant till he had been in the general study of the law . . . at least for sixteen years, which probably meant from his first entrance at an inn of chancery." 4 Reeve, Eng. Law, ed. 1787, 120, 121.

"Barristers, in England, are the highest class of lawyers who have exclusive audience in all the superior courts. Every barrister must be a member of one of the four ancient societies called 'Inns of Court,' viz. Lincoln's Inn, the Inner and Middle Temples, and Gray's Inn. . . . Associations of lawyers acquired houses of their own, in which students were educated in the common law. . . . These schools of law are now represented by the inns of court, which still enjoy the exclusive privilege of calling to the bar, and, through their superior order of benchers, control the discipline of the profession. . . . Subject to an appeal to the common-law judges, as visitors, they may reject the petition of a student to be called to the bar, or expel from their society and from the profession any barrister or bencher of the inn. . . . The peculiar business of barristers is the advocacy of causes in open court, but . . . a great deal of other business falls into their hands. They are the chief conveyancers, and the pleadings . . . are, in all but the simplest cases, drafted by them. There is indeed a separate class of conveyancers and special pleaders, being persons who have kept the necessary number of terms qualifying for a call, but who, instead of being called, take out licenses to practice under the bar. There are still a few persons who act under such special licenses. But, in general, conveyancing and special pleading form part of the ordinary work of a junior barrister. The highest rank among barristers is that of king's or queen's counsel. They lead the case in court, and give opinions on cases submitted to them; but they do not accept conveyancing or pleading, nor do they admit pupils to their chambers. Precedence among queen's counsel, as well as among our barristers, is determined by seniority. The order of serjeants at law still exists, but no new appointments have recently been made, and it will probably be allowed to become extinct, the title of queen's counsel being generally preferred. Serjeants rank after queen's counsel. . . . Barristers cannot maintain an action for their fees, which are regarded as gratuities, nor can they, by the usage of the profession, undertake a case without the intervention of an attorney." 3 Encyclopædia Britannica, 894, 895.

"There certainly has been an understanding in the profession that a barrister ought not to accept a brief in a civil suit, except from an attorney. . . . But . . . there is no rule of law by which it can be enforced. . . . This being a matter of procedure, the judges . . . might . . . have laid down a general rule, . . . but no such rule is to be found." Doe v. Hale, 15 Q. B. 171, 182, 183, 225. In early times, personal communication between counsel and client "was necessary for there were no attorneys. . . . It was not until after the Statutes of Merton (20 Hen. III. chap. 10), Westminster (3 Edw. I. chap. 33), and Gloucester (6 Edw. I. chap. 1), that suitors were allowed to appear at pleasure by attorney. The counselor was for many centuries the only person known as a 'lawyer.'" Argument of counsel in Kennedy v. Brown, 13 C. B. N. S. 677, 698.

"It has been understood in this country that the fees of a physician are honorary, and not demandable of right." Othorley v. Bolcott, 4 T. R. 317, 318. "Physicians and counsel usually perform their duties without having a legal title to remuneration. Such has been the general understanding." Vaich v. Russell, 8 Q. B. 928, 936. "Attorneys are responsible to their clients for negligence or unskillfulness, but no action lies against the counsel for his acts, if done bona fide for his client. In this respect, therefore, the counsel stands in a different position from the attorney." Swinfen v. Swinfen, 1 C. B. N. S. 864, 408. "An advocate at the English bar, accepting a brief in the usual way, undertakes a duty, but does not enter into any contract or promise, express or implied. Cases may indeed occur where, on an express promise (if he made one), he would be liable in assumpsit; but we think a barrister is to be considered, not as making a contract with his client, but as taking upon himself an office or duty, in the proper discharge of which, not merely the client, but the court in which the duty is to be performed, and the public at large, have an interest. . . . A counsel has complete authority over the suit, the mode of conducting it, and all that is incident to it. . . . No action will lie against counsel for any act honestly done in the conduct or management of the cause." Swinfen v. Chelmsford, 5 Hurlst. & N. 890, 920, 922, 928. "A promise by a client to pay money to a counsel for his advocacy, whether made before or during or after the litigation, has no 34 L. R. A.

binding effect. . . . The relation of counsel and client renders the parties mutually incapable of making any contract of hiring and service concerning advocacy in litigation. . . . If the authorities were doubtful, and it was necessary to resort to principle, the same proposition appears to us to be founded on good reason. . . . The incapacity of the advocate in litigation to make a contract of hiring affects the integrity and dignity of advocates, and so is in close relation with the highest of human interests, viz. the administration of justice." Kennedy v. Brown, 13 C. B. N. S. 677, 727, 786, 787. "I cannot allow that the counsel is the agent of the party." Best, Oh. J., in Colledge v. Horn, 3 Bing. 119, 120; Pollock, C. B., in Swinfen v. Chelmsford, 5 Hurlst. & N. 890, 907.

"In hearing motions, the course formerly was to begin every day with the senior counsel within the bar, and then to call to the next senior in order, and so on, . . . and to proceed again in the same manner upon the next and every subsequent day, although the bar had not been half, or perhaps a quarter, gone through upon any one of the former days; so that the juniors were very often obliged to attend in vain, without being able to bring on their motions, for many successive days. This practice bearing hard upon junior counsel, Lord Mansfield introduced a different rule." 1 Tidd, Pr. 461.

"The most valuable privilege formerly enjoyed by the serjeants (who, besides the judges, were limited to fifteen in number) was the monopoly of the practice in the court of common pleas." 3 Bl. Com. 27, Sharwood's note. In 1834 the king, by warrant, ordered that the right of practicing, pleading, and audience in the common pleas should cease to be exercised exclusively by the serjeants, and that all barristers should have equal right in that court with the serjeants. 10 Bing. 571. The order was obeyed till 1839, when, on motion made by Wilde, in behalf of four other serjeants and himself, the exclusive privilege of the serjeants was restored, on the ground that it was a legal right, of which they could not be deprived without an act of parliament. Wilde contended that: "The rank and office of serjeant were as ancient, and rested on the same foundation, as those held by their lordships. There was no evidence of the existence of the court without them. They were as ancient as the law itself." Newton, an apprentice (a barrister not raised to the degree of serjeant), was heard on the other side. "The learned serjeant," he said, "had contended that the crown had no power to issue a warrant which interfered with the privileges of the serjeants. By what authority, then, was it that these learned gentlemen claimed to be entitled to those privileges? By virtue of the royal writ by which they were raised to the degree of the cof. . . . They derived their appointment from the supreme executive power, and the same authority had an equal right to empower other members of the bar to enjoy equal privileges. The royal warrant was of as much force in authorizing barristers to practice in this court as the royal writ which constituted certain members of the profession serjeants at law."

"The authority of the state, degree, and office of a serjeant at law," says Tindal, Ch. J., delivering the opinion of the court, "is as high, at the least, as the existence of the court itself. . . . They are called to the state and degree of serjeant by writ, which, of itself, is a strong argument of the antiquity of their office. . . . By their oath of office, which has existed from the earliest time,—an oath by which no other barrister is bound to give attendance in any particular court,—they bind themselves 'to give due attendance for the service of the king's people in their causes.' As early as any authentic records exist, the serjeants are found to be practicing in the court of common pleas; and there is no evidence of any other barrister being allowed to practice . . . in that court. . . . From time immemorial, the serjeants have enjoyed the exclusive privilege of practicing, pleading, and audience in the court of common pleas. Immemorial enjoyment is the most solid of all titles. . . . The warrant of the crown can no more deprive the serjeant, who holds an immemorial office, of the benefits and privileges which belong to it, than it could alter the administration of the law within the court itself. The rights and privileges of the serjeant, and the rights and privileges of the peer of the realm, stand upon the same foundation,—immemorial usage." Re Serjeants at Law, 6 Bing. N. C. 187, 195, 282, 235. "The degree of serjeant was deprived of its most profitable . . . advantage (exclusive audience in the court of common pleas) by the Statute of 9 & 10 Vict. chap. 54, which extends to all barristers the privileges of serjeants in" that court. 3 Bl. Com. 27, Stewart's note.

English attorneys at law (called "solicitors" since the Judicature Act of 1873 took effect) are not members of the bar, and are not heard in the superior courts; and the power of admitting them to practice, and striking them off the roll, has not been given to the lords of court. "That part of the profession which is carried on by attorneys is liberal and reputable, as well as useful to the public, . . . and they ought to be protected where they act to the best of their skill and knowledge. But every man is liable to error. . . . A counsel may mistake, as well as an attorney. Yet no one will say that a counsel who has been mistaken shall be charged with the debt. The counsel, indeed, is honorary in his advice, and does not demand a fee. The attorney may demand a compensation. But neither of them ought to be charged with the debt, for a mistake." Pitt v. Yalden, 4 Burr. 2060, 2061. "An attorney is supposed to be always present in court; and on that account has many privileges belonging to him in common with the other officers of the court. Where an attorney is plaintiff, he is entitled to sue in his own court, by attachment of privilege, and may lay the venue in Middlesex. Where he is defendant, he must be sued in his own court by bill, even as acceptor of a bill of exchange, and cannot be arrested or holden to special bail. . . . An attorney is also, by reason of the supposed necessity of his attendance in court, exempt from all offices that require personal service, . . . and formerly he was not liable to serve in the militia. . . . These privileges are allowed, not so much for the benefit of attorneys, as of their clients, and are therefore confined to attorneys who practice, or at least have practiced within a year." 1 Tidd, Pr. 204-266.

"An attorney-at law . . . is one who is put in the place, stead, or turn of another, to manage his matters of law. Formerly, every suitor was obliged to appear in person, to prosecute or defend his suit, . . . unless by special license under the king's letters patent. . . . But . . . it is now permitted in general, by divers ancient statutes, whereof the first is Stat. Westminster, 8, chap. 10, that attorneys may be made to prosecute or defend any action. . . . These attorneys are now formed into a regular corps. They are admitted to the execution of their office by the superior courts of Westminster Hall, and are, in all points, officers of the respective courts of which they are admitted. . . . No man can practice as an attorney in any of those courts, but such as is admitted and sworn an attorney of that particular court. An attorney of the court of king's bench cannot practice in the court of common pleas, nor vice versa. To practice in the court of chancery it is also necessary to be admitted a solicitor therein." 3 Bl. Com. 25, 26.

"'Attorney,' in English law, signifies, in its widest sense, any substitute or agent appointed to act in 'the turn, stead, or place of another.' The term is now commonly confined to a class of qualified agents who undertake the conduct of legal proceedings for their clients. By the common law the actual presence of the parties to a suit was considered indispensable; but the privilege of appearing by attorney was conceded in certain cases by special dispensation, until the Statute of Merton and subsequent enactments made it competent for both parties, in all judicial proceedings, to appear by attorney. Solicitors appear to have been at first distinguished from attorneys, as not having the attorney's power to bind their principals; but latterly the distinction has been between attorneys, as the agents formally appointed in actions at law, and solicitors, who take care of proceedings in parliament, chancery, privy council, etc. In practice, however, and in ordinary language, the terms are synonymous. . . . The qualification necessary for admission on the rolls of attorneys and solicitors" are fixed by statute. "They may act as advocates in certain of the inferior courts. Conveyancing, formerly considered the exclusive business of the bar, is now often performed by attorneys. Barristers are understood to require the intervention of an attorney in all cases that come before them professionally, although in criminal cases the prisoner not unfrequently engages a counsel directly, by giving him a fee in open court." 3 Encyclopædia Britannica, 62.

"The court, by common law, had no power to admit an attorney . . . to practice. . . . It was the policy of the common law, in order that suits might not multiply and increase, that both plaintiff and defendant should appear in person. . . . While the justices could not permit a person to appear by attorney, the king, by the plenitude of his prerogative, might appoint an attorney, and give any person a right to appear in this manner. Letters-patent would issue out of chancery, or under the privy seal, commanding the justices to admit such and such a person as attorney for another, in regard to the particular suit in question. . . . Such an attorney was simply an attorney in fact. . . . The power of clients to appoint attorneys was conferred in England by Stat. Westminster, 2 (3 Edw. I. chap. 42), in certain cases. The object of this legislation was to confer the right to appear by attorney without applying to the king. . . . In those cases to which the statute and succeeding acts did not extend, the courts were very rigid in applying the former rule. . . . The character and qualifications of an attorney were not all involved by these statutes. He was simply an attorney in fact. Any one could, by legal principles, be an attorney. The king might send a message to the courts to receive such person as the party may name. . . . The courts say in one case (Year Book, 21 Hen. VI. 80 . . . ) that by the rules of law an out law or an attainted clerk may be an attorney in a suit, though such persons could not themselves bring actions. They reason why they could appear as attorneys was because they sued in autre droit. . . . Lord Coke tells us that the introduction of attorneys was a great and lamentable innovation upon the common law. 2 Inst. 250. The king, for a time. . . . attempted to regulate the matter. In 20 Edw. I., he directed the justices to provide and appoint, according to their discretion, attorneys in every county. Seven score he thought enough for all England; but the justices, in their discretion, might increase the number. . . . The idea that attorneys held offices undoubtedly grew out of the limitation of their number in the ordinance of King Edward I. These measures, however, did not reach the evil. The legislature passed, in the reign of Henry IV., the model act upon this subject, and from which all subsequent legislation has derived an impress. 2 Inst. 215. This act, after reciting in the preamble the mischiefs growing out of the former system, proceeds as follows: That all attorneys shall be examined by the justices, and that by their discretion their names shall be put upon the roll, and that they be good, virtuous, and of good fame, and be received and sworn well to serve in their offices. And the other attorneys shall be put out by the discretion of the justices, and if any of the attorneys do die the justices shall make another in his place. 4 Hen. IV. chap. 18. . . . Before this statute, no regulations had been made, either to define the qualifications for an attorney, or to point out who should be at liberty to undertake the office. . . . This statute is very important, both for what it enacts and what it discloses. It shows that an attorney at that time held an office; that no system of testing attainments or character existed. . . . Attorneys now for the first time go on the roll. They become attorneys of record, and cease to be mere attorneys in fact. . . . Coke (in 4 Inst. 76) laments the increase of attorneys beyond the number allowed by law. . . . Several parliaments passed statutes decreasing the number of attorneys. 2 Coke, Inst. 250." Argument of Theodore W. Dwight in Cooper's Case, 23 N. Y. 67, 69-76.

"Attorney" is an ancient English word, and signifieth one that is set in the turn, stead, or place of another; and of these some be private, . . . and some be public, as attorneys-at law, whose warrant from his master is, 'Ponit loco suo talem attorneyem suum,'—which setteth in his turn or place such a man to be his attorney. . . . The authority to deliver seisin . . . must be by deed, for 'letter d'attorney' is as much as a warrant of attorney by deed, for litters do signify sometime a deed. . . . Few persons are disabled to be private attorneys to deliver seisin; for monks, infants, feme coverts, persons attainted, outlawed, excommunicated, villeins, aliens, etc., may be attorneys. A feme may be an attorney to deliver seisin to her husband." Co. Litt. 51b, 52a. "In another place [128a], Lord Coke cites a passage from the Mirror which excludes both infants and femes covert from being attorneys. . . . But that is quite reconcilable with the doctrine here; for there public attorneys for prosecuting suits at law are meant, whose office cannot be properly executed without considerable knowledge and discretion; but here Lord Coke, in the first part of the sentence, confines himself to private attorneys to deliver seisin, which is an act so merely ministerial that it may be done by the most ignorant." Hargraves, note, 332. "What manner of men attorneys ought to be, or rather what they ought not to be, hear what antiquity hath said: 'Attorneyes poient estre tous ceuz, aux queuz ley voile suffer. Femmes ne poient estre attorneyes, ne enfans, ne serfs, ne nul que est en garde ou autrement fait de foy, ne nul crimineux, ne nul es-voigne, ne nul que n'est a la foy le roy, ne nul que ne poet estre counter,' etc. Mirror, chap. 2, § 21." Co. Litt. 128a. The authority of a private attorney "must be by deed, that it may appear that the attorney has pursued his commission. Of this all persons are capable. . . . this being only a naked authority." Bacon, Abr. Attorney.

"Forasmuch as in a writ of assise, attainrs, and juris utrum, the jurors have been often troubled by reason of the essoins of tenants, it is provided that after the tenant hath once appeared in court, he shall be no more essoined, but shall make his attorney to sue for him, if he will." Westminster, I., chap. 43. "By the policy of the common law, that suits might not increase and multiply, . . . both plaintiff and defendant, demandant and tenant, in all actions, real, personal, and mixed, did appear in person, . . . because the writs do command the tenant or defendant to appear, which was always taken in proper person; and the entry in every action for the demandant or plaintiff is, 'Et practicus petens' or 'Querens obtulit se & dis,' which was ever understood in proper person. But when this and other statutes had given way to appear by attorney, it is not credible how . . . suits in law (for the most part unnecessary and for trifling causes), when the parties themselves might sit quiet at home, increased and multiplied; so dangerous and ill success have ever had the breach of the maxims, and ancient rules of the common law." 2 Co. Inst. 249.

"Our lord the king of his special grace granteth that such as have land," in certain cases, "may make a general attorney to sue for them . . . which attorney or attorneys shall have full power in all pleas moved during the circuit, until the plea be determined, or that his master remove him." Westminster, 2, chap. 10. "Here," says Coke, "is an act of grace . . . for where the king, by his prerogative, before this and other statutes, might by letters-patents, or by writ under his great seal, grant to any demandant or plaintiff, tenant or defendant, to make attorney in any action, and command the judges to admit such persons to be attorneys for him, now justly is this act stilled an act of grace, for that the king gave his royal assent to this law for the quiet and safety of his subjects, giving them power hereby to make attorneys in cases herein expressed, whereby the king lost such profit of the great seal as he formerly received in such cases" 2 Co. Inst. 377, 378.

It seemeth that before the statutes which gave power unto a man to make an attorney, the justices would not suffer that the plaintiff or the defendant or the demandant or the tenant should make attorney in any action, . . . because the words of the writ do command the defendant for to appear, etc., and that was always taken to be in proper person. The form of entry in every action for the plaintiff or demandant is: 'Et praed. quer. obtulit se . . . & praed. def. non venit; ideo praecipitur est vic; quod,' etc., by which it is taken that the plaintiff was to appear in proper person. But now, by the statutes, he may make attorney in a court-baron, or other courts; and may make attorney for suit personal at the hundred or other court-baron; but for suit real at the leet, or at the sheriff's torn, he cannot do it by attorney, but he ought to do the same in proper person. But it seemeth that the king by his prerogative, and before the statutes, might give warrant unto a man to make attorney in every action or suit, . . . and that he may direct his writs or letters unto the judges of courts, commanding them to admit and receive such persons by their attorney, and that the judges are bound to do the same. . . . And if tenant for life be impleaded in a praecipis quod reddat, he in the reversion may pray to be received to defend his right upon the default of the tenant, or upon his faint pleading, and there he cannot pray to be received by his attorney. But if he bring a writ unto the justices out of the chancery, testifying that he hath made attorney there, and rehearse the cause whereof, that is to say, because he is sick, or other reasonable cause, and commanding them to receive such person by attorney for him in the reversion, the court ought and is bound to receive him by his attorney. . . . And the king, by his letters-patent, may license a man to make a general attorney 'in omnibus placitis motis and morendis, and in quibuscunque cur,' and by his letters-patent he may express who shall be attorney, etc., or may grant to make attorney whom or who he will. . . . And the king, by his writ, may send to any person to receive attorney for another, such person generally as the other will name, or such persons specially, and that may be as well for the demandant or plaintiff as for the defendant or tenant. And the king may give authority unto one person to receive attorney for another in all pleas, and in all courts for two or three years. And the king may grant a dedimus potestatem to receive attorney for another, for a special cause recited in the writ, because he is languishing or lame, or decrepit, etc., or such other like special cause. Or he may grant a dedimus potestatem, in the generality to receive attorney for another in all pleas, without expressing any cause in certain wherefore he doth so. And also it appeareth by the register that the king, by his letters-patent, may grant unto the prior of St. John's of Jerusalem that he may make two of his friars, and name them, etc., in his place, which is in the place of a proctor; that the two friars shall make attorney for the prior in every action which is pendant, or to be brought against him in any court, etc., and for to challenge his liberties, and for to defend them. And also the king, by his letters-patent, may grant unto an abbot . . . that he may make a general attorney for all pleas, and in all courts; and the said abbot may remove him and put others in his room as often as it shall seem good and needful for him so to do. And so by this it doth appear that the king may grant unto all his subjects to make attorneys in the same manner, without putting or showing any cause in the letters-patent. And it appeareth by the register that the king may grant the same as well by letters-patent under his privy seal as by letters-patent under his great seal. And when the king makes a general grant unto an abbot, or unto any other, to make such general attorneys, then it seems the abbot shall come into the chancery, or shall send his deed under his seal unto the chancellor, witnessing that he hath made such and such persons his attorneys, etc. And thereupon the chancellor shall make letters-patent unto the abbot, testifying that he hath made such and such persons his attorneys in all pleas and courts; and upon these letters-patent, showed unto the court, the judge ought to admit and receive those persons for attorneys for the party, and these letters-patent shall be entered upon record in the chancery. And the king may send his writ unto the justices of the common pleas, or unto the justices in eyre, or other justices whatsoever, testifying that such a one hath made his general attorney in all pleas and quarrels moved against him or by him, and also to challenge his franchises or to defend his franchises, commanding the justices by the writ that they receive him for attorney, etc. There is another writ, also, in the register, that the king, by his writ, shall command his justices in eyre that they admit and receive the claim of such a one to certain liberties, which he shall make and claim before them by his attorney, because himself cannot be personally before them at the day. There is another form of writ to the justices, that they admit such a one by his attorney, whom the said party shall make his attorney by letters-patent under his seal. And a man may make his attorney before the justices without making an attorney in chancery, or without suing any writ unto the justices, commanding them to admit any attorney for the party plaintiff or defendant, as the common course is at this day for an attorney for every party to appear in every manner of action that they can appear by attorney, and put in their warrants without any such writs, if not that they be in writs of entry in the post, or writ which is by coven between the parties, or a writ of right. Then the justices, in discretion, do not admit any man to appear an attorney for the party defendant unless the defendant do, before some justice, confess him to be his attorney, and that the justices do record the warrant, or otherwise, that he bring a writ out of the chancery testifying that he hath there made attorney, commanding them for to receive him for his attorney. But there are divers cases in which the justices will not admit the defendant by attorney; as, if he came in by ceps corpus, they will not admit him by attorney, until he hath pleaded some plea, and then, in discretion, they use to suffer the defendant to make attorney. . . . And a man shall not make an attorney against the king in any action sued by the king. Upon a rescous returned by the sheriff, and an attachment awarded upon it against him, the defendant shall not make attorney, but, upon his appearance, shall be presently committed unto the Fleet. But if the king send a privy seal unto them, commanding them that they admit attorney for him, the court ought to receive the attorney without appearance in proper person. . . . In a promissio the defendant shall not make attorney without a special writ directed to the justices. After a capias ad computandum awarded, the defendant shall not make attorney. . . . He who pleads misnomer shall not make attorney. . . . A feme covert may be attorney for her husband. . . . And see in the register . . . writs directed unto the bailiffs of hund, to receive and admit such persons by attorney in court, which the party will make under his seal, or otherwise; and also writs of dedimus potestatem to remove attorneys made, and to put others in their places. . . . And if a man make attorney in chancery to answer and defend in other courts, he may come in chancery, and remove him, and make others his attorneys; and thereupon he shall have a writ unto the justices of the court where the attorney is, testifying that he hath removed him, and made another his attorney, commanding them for to receive him, etc. There is . . . in the register . . . a writ directed unto the justices to receive an attorney for a woman who prayed to be received for the default of her husband. . . . There is another writ in the register directed unto the justices for him in reversion, where tenant for life is impleaded, commanding them for to admit attorney for him in the reversion, if the tenant for life make default, as he conceived he will. . . . because that he in the reversion hath such an infirmity that he cannot pray to be received in proper person. And the like writ for a feme covert, who hath a reversion, and the tenant for life is impleaded, and she conceiveth that her husband will not pray to be received, etc. But in the writ it shall be mentioned that the feme is decrepit, or hath some other infirmity, that she cannot conveniently come to be received in proper person. . . . If a man be attorney for another in a plea real, . . . and afterwards, by coven between the attorney and the demandant, the attorney makes default for which the land is lost, the tenant who lost the land shall have a writ of deceit against the attorney. . . . An attorney shall have an action of debt against his client for money which he hath paid unto any person for his client, for costs of suit, or unto his counsel, etc." Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 25-27, 96, 121.

"The first colonists of New England were fishermen and farmers. Their leaders were clergymen, and, though they brought with them a general idea of English law and English liberty, the registers of writs were sealed books to them, as much as they are to us at this day. Instead of attempting to follow the forms of the register, they devised processes of their own. The recital of some of them will show that no reverence for any ancient forms existed among the courts here. . . . Judgments by default for want of any appearance after due service of a single proper process was an original invention of New England, and has existed here since a very early date after the first settlement of the country. . . . We are not aware of any objection to this ancient New England usage. . . . The foundation of the English common law, with its infinite niceties, was nothing more than usage, and usage here holds as high a place in our esteem as usage there. Indeed, we regard the ignorance of the first colonists of the technicalities of the common law as one of the most fortunate things in the history of the law, since, while the substance of the common law was preserved, we happily lost a great mass of antiquated and useless rubbish, and gained in its stead a course of practice of admirable simplicity, and one which seems to us far better than the most improved codes of practice which have been recently introduced elsewhere." Boston, O. & M. R. Co. v. State, 33 N. H. 215, 230, 231.

The extracts from Fitzherbert, Natura Brevium, relating to the exercise of royal prerogative before the statutes allowed appearance by attorney, present a sample of what has been lost. No prerogative or statute was ever necessary in this state to enable litigants to appear by their agents. The law regulating the admission of attorneys is a part of the law of procedure, and our common law allows such procedure as justice and convenience require. Boody v. Watson, 64 N. H. 162, 171-173, 178, 179. Justice requires that a party should be permitted to conduct his cause in person (subject to reasonable requirements of propriety), or by any agent of good character, and that the test of the agent's character should not be so rigorously applied as to imperil the constitutional right to a fair trial. But no one should commonly practice as an attorney without the mental and moral qualifications adequate for a business in which the administration of justice is deeply concerned, and in which his unfitness would naturally bring serious disaster upon his employers and himself. These rules of our common law of procedure have been affirmed by the legislature. Gen. Laws, chap. 218, §§ 1, 2. As a mass of details, the English law on the subject, being inapplicable to our situation and circumstances, is not in force in this state; and, if no relevant and decisive general principle of that law has been adopted here, this case must be determined by the common law that grows out of American conditions. Concord Mfg. Co. v. Robertson, 66 N. H. 1, 6, 7, 18 L. R. A. 679; State v. Saunders, 66 N. H. 39, 72, 78, 18 L. R. A. 646.

In Oliver v Ingram, 2 Strange, 1114, "two points were made: (1) Whether a woman was capable of being chosen sexton [of a parish]; and (2) whether women could vote in the election. As to the first, the court seemed to have no difficulty, . . . nor did I think proper to argue it, there having been many cases where offices of greater consequence have been held by women, and there being many women sextons now in London. . . . As to the second point, 4 Co. Inst. 5, was cited to show women could not vote for members of parliament or coroners. . . . But the court, notwithstanding, held that this being an office that did not concern the public, or the care and inspection of the morals of the parishioners, there was no reason to exclude women who paid rates from the privilege of voting. They observed, here was no usage of excluding them stated, which perhaps might have altered the case." "I am clearly of opinion," said Lee, Ch. J., delivering the judgment of the court, "that a woman may be sexton of a parish. Women have held much higher offices, and, indeed, almost all the offices of the kingdom, as queen, marshal, great chamberlain, great constable, champion of England, commissioner of sewers, keeper of a prison, and returning officer for members of parliament. (2) As to the second point, it would be strange if a woman may herself fill the office, and yet should be disqualified to vote for it. The election of members of parliament and of coroners stands on special grounds. No woman has ever sat in parliament, or voted for members of parliament, and we must presume that when the franchise was first created it was confined to the male sex. There was no reason for such a restriction respecting the office of sexton, whose duties do not concern the morals of the living, but the interment of the dead." 8 Campbell, Ch. Just. 68.

In 1787 a woman and two men, being the only householders of "the township of the monastery of Ronton Abbey," "an extra parochial place," were appointed overseers of the poor. King v. Stubbs, 2 T. R. 895, 406. "We think," says Ashurst, J., delivering the opinion of the court, "that the circumstances of one of the persons appointed being a woman does not vitiate the appointment. The only qualification required by 43 Elizabeth is that they shall be substantial householders. It has no reference to sex. The only question, then is whether there is anything in the nature of the office that should make women incompetent, and we think there is not. There are many instances where, in offices of a higher nature, they are held not to be disqualified, as in the case of the office of high chamberlain, high constable, and marshal, and that of a common constable, which is both an office of trust, and likewise, in a degree, judicial. So in the case of the office of sexton. As to the case in Viner's Abridgment, title Poor, 415 (Re v. Moor), that is no conclusive authority. It is to be collected from the case that there were other persons in the parish proper to serve; and, if so, the court held that the justices had not acted improperly in refusing to approve of a woman. Where there are a sufficient number of men qualified to serve the office, they are certainly more proper, but that is not the case here; and therefore, if there is no absolute incapacity, it is proper in this instance, from the necessity of the case. And there is no danger of making it a general practice, for, as the justices are invested with a discretionary power of approbation, it is not likely that they will approve of such an appointment when there are other proper objects."

In Hearle v. Greenbank, 1 Ves. Sr. 298, 8 Atk. 695, a testator had devised realty to trustees to the use of his daughter, a married minor, during her life, with power, "notwithstanding her coverture," to dispose of it as she should think fit; and, while a minor, she made a will, devising it in pursuance of the power. Hardwicke, Ld. Ch., holding that the power was not executed, said: "There are some kind of powers an infant may execute, as where he is a mere instrument or conduit pipe, where no prudence or discretion is required, or where his right is not affected. 1 Co. Inst. 52a. 'Few persons are disabled to be private attorneys to deliver seisin: for monks, infants, feme covert, etc., may be attorneys.' As this opinion of Lord Coke is delivered, it seems at first as if he meant only to deliver seisin, which is merely a ministerial act; although the latter words are general. Yet he himself (1 Co. Inst. 128a) says that an infant cannot be an attorney. It is therefore pretty much undetermined how far infants can be attorneys, unless to deliver seisin or such a ministerial act. But that is different from these kind of powers. . . . It is said that a feme covert may execute a power, which was so determined in Rich v. Beaumont, 6 Bro. P. C. 152, upon the execution of a power created before she was covert, and so in a case before Lord King. So a power to a feme covert to make leases is good. . . . I take it in law that the disability of an infant with respect to the real estate is more favored, and a stronger disability, than that of feme covert. In Hob. 95, there are some cases put, and there is a marginal note very material. And here I will take notice that the notes in Hobart are allowed to be his own. The note is this: 'Coverture was not at common law so far protected as infancy, and some other disabilities, as non sane memory, etc.,' the ground of the disability being not from want of judgment, but from being under the power of her husband,—she having as much judgment as if discover. . . . The disability of an infant arises from want of judgment."

"A grant of an office requiring skill, to an infant to be exercised in presenti, is void. . . . Offices merely ministerial, which do not require particular skill and knowledge, and exercisable by deputy, may be granted to any person, and even to women. Thus, a woman may have the office of the custody of a castle. And Lord Coke [4 Inst. 8, 11] mentions an instance of a woman's having the office of forester in fee simple; but he observes that she could not execute the office herself, but was obliged to appoint a deputy, during the eye, who should be sworn." The Earl of Hereford held manors of the king "by the service of being constable of England, and had issue,—two daughters. Upon a question how the daughters, before marriage, could exercise the office, it was resolved that they might make their sufficient deputy to do it for them, and after marriage the husband of the eldest might do it alone. . . . The following question was put to the judges: 'The late Duke of Ancaster having died seised of the office of great chamberlain of England, leaving' two sisters, 'does the said office belong to the eldest alone, or to both? . . . Or does it devolve upon the king to name a proper person to execute the office during the incapacity of the heir?' The judges delivered their unanimous opinion "that the office belonged to both sisters; . . . that both sisters might execute it by deputy, to be appointed by them." 8 Cruise, Dig. 123-126.

Cobbett v. Hudson, 15 Q. B. 938, "was an action against the keeper of the queen's prison for a false return to a habeas corpus. On the trial, before Pollock, C. B., . . . the plaintiff, who was in custody, did not appear by either counsel or attorney, or in person; but his wife appeared, and proposed to conduct the cause on his behalf. The lord chief baron, after conference with Erle, J., refused to permit this; and the plaintiff was nonsuited. . . . The plaintiff, in person, now moved that the nonsuit might be set aside. . . . Lord Campbell, Ch. J. 'We cannot say that the lord chief baron was wrong in refusing to hear the wife of the plaintiff, as an advocate. The nonsuit was regular. The plaintiff was called, and appeared neither by counsel or attorney, nor in person, but his wife claimed to appear for him. The question, therefore is whether, as of right, the wife of a party may insist on appearing on his behalf in a civil cause. There is no such rule in a civil suit. The first day I sat here, Mrs. Cobbett desired to make a motion on behalf of her husband for a habeas corpus; and I heard her without the smallest scruple, as my illustrious predecessor, Hale, heard the wife of John Bunyan. 2 Campbell, Ch. Just. 210-218. On each of those occasions the liberty of the subject was in question; and in such a case great inconvenience might arise from refusing to hear the wife, or any person, on behalf of the party who was under restraint. But a proceeding at nisi prius is very different. There can be no similar necessity there for the wife's appearance as counsel to conduct the cause for her husband. There would at least be opportunity for applying to a gentleman of the bar, and we know that on such an occasion any member of the bar would come forward without any honorarium, and see justice done. And this would be much better than that the wife of a party should come in to court to wrangle at nisi prius, and engage in scenes inconsistent with the character of her sex. I think the lord chief baron and my Brother Erle did right.' Coleridge, . . . Wightman, and Erle, JJ., concurred. Rule refused."

"The real question . . . is whether an infant is by law capable of discharging the duties of a deputy of the sheriff specially deputed to serve and return a particular writ of attachment. . . . It seems always to have been held that an infant could not be a juror. . . . So he could not be an attorney of a court, . . . nor administrator of an estate, . . . nor could he act as an executor until he arrived at the age of seventeen years. . . . An infant could not execute the office of a judge," nor "hold the office of clerk of a court, where it was part of the duty of the office to receive the money of the suitors. . . . But, notwithstanding these disabilities, there are many things which can be legally done by an infant. . . . Females at the age of twelve, and males of the age of fourteen years, may dispose of personal property by will. . . . It has long been settled that infants were capable of holding certain ministerial offices. . . . Upon a thorough examination of the adjudged cases, . . . we are satisfied that the principle they establish is that some offices can, and some cannot, be held by infants. Offices where judgment and discretion and experience are essentially necessary . . . are not to be intrusted in the hands of infants. But they may hold offices which are merely ministerial, and which require nothing more than skill and diligence. . . . The service and return" of the writ "seem . . . to be as merely ministerial [Mechem, Pub. Off. §§ 657-659] as any that can be conceived." Moore v. Graves, 3 N. H. 408, 410-412. The liability of the sheriff was held to be ample protection for all who might be injured by the acts of negligence of the special deputy.

The appointment or election of a person to a public position, the payment of his wages by taxation, and the importance of his work, are not conclusive proof that his public duty is, in the ordinary sense, a public office. A teacher of a public school, who is selected by the school board, but is not an officer (Lander v. Seaver, 32 Vt. 123, 76 Am. Dec. 156), is paid by the district. A register of deeds, who is an officer, is paid, like a physician or attorney, by individuals who happen to need his services. "As morality and piety . . . will give the best and greatest security to government," the legislature is empowered to authorize "the several towns, parishes, bodies corporate or religious societies . . . to make adequate provision . . . for the support and maintenance of public . . . teachers of piety, religion, and morality. Provided . . . that the several towns, parishes, bodies corporate, or religious societies shall . . . have the exclusive right of electing their own public teachers, and of contracting with them for their support and maintenance." Bill of Rights, art. 6. This is the substance of the Act of 1714, which was an enactment of previous custom. Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 139, 231, 16 Am. Rep. 82. From an early day in the history of the province, until 1819, the town minister was chosen by the majority of voters in town meeting. His salary was paid from the town treasury. His employment as teacher, in a meeting-house built and controlled by the town for public use, was public. In a certain sense it was official, like that of a teacher of a public school. But it was nonofficial in such a sense that women could legally be called to it. In the exercise of their parochial right of electing ministers, towns were as unrestricted as voluntary religious societies are now. If women had never been teachers of public schools, they could be employed as such, notwithstanding the usage, and without an alteration of the law, because that public employment has not been understood to be an office. Not being an office, in the ordinary sense, it is open to women at common law, whatever the usage may have been. "The relation that subsists between a minister and the town [by which he is elected] is civil. That which subsists between a minister and the church is spiritual." "Public teachers of religion and morality, chosen by a town, 'are, to every purpose, civil officers of the state,—as much so as schoolmasters and magistrates." Muzzy v. Wilkins, Smith (N. H.) 1, 14. In such a connection, no distinction being made between public office and other public employment, "civil officers of the state" means persons in the civil service of the state.

Great numbers of persons, male and female, who are not regarded as public officers, are employed by the public, and selected and paid by public authority. In the civil service, the classification is not as distinct as among privates and commissioned and non-commissioned officers, and the location of the official line, at some points, may be a subject of controversy. In some instances a test may be found in that universal understanding which is the sanction and source of much common law. 107 Mass. 604; Sharswood, Law Lectures, 196, 199. While a removal of common law disability by legislation was necessary to enable women to be members of school boards (Gen. Laws, chap. 87, § 10; Laws 1879, chap. 57, § 19), no statute was required to authorize their election as public teachers. "Although an office is an employment, it does not follow that every employment is an office. A man may certainly be employed under a contract, express or implied, to perform a service, without becoming an officer." United States v. Maurice, 2 Brock. 96. Fed. Cas. No. 15,747. "A public office . . . is never conferred by contract. . . . Where, therefore, the authority in question was conferred by a contract, it must be regarded as an employment, and not as a public office" Mechem, Pub. Off. § 5. Ministers elected by towns were considered a class of teachers employed by contract. In this and other cases, the making of contracts by voters in town meeting was an exercise of governmental power. "A government office is different from a government contract." United States v. Hartwell, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 385, 393, 18 L. ed. 830, 831. A contractor for carrying the mail is not an officer of the government, nor is the employment an office. Whitehouse v. Langdon, 10 N. H. 331.

Under a constitutional provision that no senator or representative should, during the term for which he was elected, "be appointed to any civil office of profit," under the state, which had been created during such term, the justices were of opinion that "every 'office,' in the constitutional meaning of the term, implies an authority to exercise some portion of the sovereign power, either in making, executing, or administering the laws," and that an agent appointed by the governor, under a legislative resolution, for the preservation of timber on the public lands, and for other purposes, would not hold such an office, and need not take the oath required by the constitution of persons elected or appointed to "office under this state." 3 Greenl. 481, 483; United States v. Hatch, 1 Pinney, 182. In dispersing a mob or suppressing an insurrection, 24 L. R. A.

sovereign power may be exercised by the rank and file, as well as by the governor, president, or other commander in chief. In making a lawful arrest, the sheriff exercises the same power; and a woman giving him necessary assistance, though not an officer, is not a trespasser. Rez v. Pinney, 5 Car. & P. 260, 261, note; Phillips v. Eyre, L. R. 6 Q. B. 15. In executing the laws, the sovereign power employs many officers and many agents and workmen who are not officers. Mechem, Pub. Off. cc. 1, 2; Paine, Elect. §§ 126, 127.

A selectman is a public officer. State v. Boody, 58 N. H. 610. A representative in the legislature is a state officer, within the meaning of the Act of June 23, 1813. Morri v. Haines, 2 N. H. 246. In Doyle v. Raleigh, 89 N. C. 133, 45 Am. Rep. 677, the plaintiff was elected an alderman of a city while acting, under an appointment from the treasury department of the United States, at a salary of $60 a month, as night watchman of a post-office building. The state constitution provides that "no person who shall hold any office or place of trust or profit under the United States, or any department thereof . . . shall hold or exercise any other office or place of trust or profit under the authority of this state." Art. 14, § 7. It was held that the plaintiff's federal employment was not an office, or place of trust or profit. In such a case there might be doubts, or a difference of opinion. A public service may be an office or place of trust for some purpose, in some sense, within the meaning of one law, though not an office or place of trust for all purposes, in every sense, within the meaning of other laws, and legislative intent may be defeated by an invariable definition. In Roland v. New York, 83 N. Y. 372, the question was whether supervisors had authority to increase the plaintiff's compensation as "an attendant upon the supreme court." A statute had prohibited their "creating any new office, . . . or increasing the salaries of those now in office." It was held that the object of the law was to limit expenses; that it was reasonable to suppose "the legislature had in mind . . . all persons who, under any name, were the recipients of salaries from the city treasury; and that in this extended sense the words of the act should be construed."

"The term 'office' has no legal or technical meaning attached to it, distinct from its ordinary acceptations. An office is a public charge or employment; but, as every employment is not an office, it is sometimes difficult to distinguish between employments which are, and those which are not, offices. . . . 'A public officer is one who has some duty to perform concerning the public; and he is not the less a public officer when his duty is confined to narrow limits because it is the duty and the nature of that duty, which makes him a public officer, and not the extent of his authority.' 7 Bacon, Abr. 280; King v. Burnell, Carth. 479. . . . Where an employment or duty is a continuing one, which is defined by rules prescribed by law, and not by contract, such a charge or employment is an office, and the person who performs it is an officer. . . . The powers vested in the government of the state of Mississippi are either legislative, judicial or executive; and these respective branches of power have been committed to separate bodies of magistracy. . . . Whether an office has been created by the constitution itself, or by statute, . . . the incumbent, as a component member of one of the bodies of the magistracy, is vested with a portion of the power of the government. . . . The words 'civil office under the state' . . . import an office in which is reposed some portion of the sovereign power of the state; and of necessity having some connection with the legislative, judicial, or executive departments of the government. . . . The local and limited power and duties of the levee commissioner can have no effect in determining the question whether his office is not an office under the state. A member of the board of county police, or a justice of the peace, is as much an officer under the state as the executive, the heads of department, or a member of the judiciary. The powers attached to the office of levee commissioner evidently pertain to the executive branch of the government. Clothed with a portion of the power vested in that department, the commissioner, in the discharge of his proper functions, exercises as clearly sovereign power as the governor or a sheriff." Shelby v. Alcorn, 36 Miss. 278, 288-290, 292, 73 Am. Dec. 169. The constitution provided that "no senator or representative" should, during his term, "be appointed to any civil office of profit under this state," which had been created during his legislative term. The object of the clause was manifest, and the office of levee commissioner was held to be within the mischief which the prohibition was intended to prevent.

"By the Constitution of 1846 (art. 6, § 8), the judges of the court of appeals and justices of the supreme court were prohibited from exercising 'any power of appointment to public office.' . . . The term 'office' has a very general signification, and is defined to be that function by virtue whereof a person has some employment in the affairs of another; it may be public or private, or quasi public, as exercised under public authority, but yet affecting only the affairs of particular individuals. The presidency of a bank is spoken of as an office, and a trustee of a private trust is, in ordinary parlance, said to hold the office of trustee; and the term 'office' is applied to an executor or guardian, etc. A referee, for the trial and decision of actions is an officer exercising judicial powers under public authority. So, receivers appointed by the courts, and commissioners for the appraisal of damages for lands taken for public use, are officers, and strictly and technically exercise the functions of an office. But they are not public officers, within the inhibition of the constitution. . . . They are not called upon to take the constitutional oath of office." Opinion of the majority in Re Hathaway, 71 N. Y. 238, 242, 243. "The power of courts of law and equity to appoint referees and receivers. . . was a part of their acknowledged authority and jurisdiction prior to and at the time of the adoption of the constitution. They were said to be officers of the court. . . . The power of the courts to act through official agencies of their own appointment . . . was incident to their jurisdiction and, passed to the supreme court as a part of the general jurisdiction of law and equity conferred by section 8, article 6, of the Constitution. . . . Assuming, therefore, that receivers and referees are public officers (a point which we do not determine), the power of appointment . . . was continued in the new supreme court by the . . . constitution." Opinion of the minority in the same case, pages 252, 253.

"An attorney-at-law is an officer of the court. The terms of the oaths exacted of him at his admission to the bar prove him to be so: 'You shall behave yourself in your office of attorney within the court, with all due fidelity as well to the court as the client.'" Austin's Case, 5 Rawle, 191, 203, 28 Am. Dec. 657. "Attorneys who have been admitted to practice as such are officers of the court, of whom the court will take judicial notice, and generally will not require them to show their authority to appear; and if questioned, the declaration of the attorney that he has such authority will ordinarily be sufficient." Stevens v. Fuller, 55 N. H. 443; Thomas v. Steele, 22 Wis. 207, 209. "The agreement was signed by the attorneys of record. They were officers of the court, and their signatures were judicially known to the court." Scrippelmann v. Clark, 11 Tex. 296, 298. "The office of an attorney is quasi public, and his conduct semi official. Ex parte Wallis, 73 Ind. 95, 106.

"For the better understanding in what cases the court may proceed in the manner above mentioned [summarily, by attachment],

. . . I shall endeavor to show where it may so proceed against the ministers of the court, and, where against others. As to the first of these points, I shall consider where it may so proceed against sheriffs, bailiffs of franchises, and sheriffs' bailiffs; where against attorneys, and others acting as such; where against other officers. . . . I shall endeavor to show—First, where the court may so proceed against sheriffs, bailiffs of franchises, and sheriffs' bailiffs, for not executing a writ; secondly, where for doing it oppressively; thirdly, where for not doing it effectually; fourthly, where for making a false return. . . . As to the second point, viz. in what cases the court may proceed, in the manner above mentioned, against attorneys, and others acting as such, I shall endeavor to show—First, where it may so proceed against them for appearing for a person without sufficient authority, secondly, where for injustice to their clients; thirdly, where for . . . dishonest practice. . . . Where the court may proceed, in the manner above mentioned, against other officers of the court. There being scarce anything of this kind to be met with in the books, I shall only observe that it seems clear, from the general reason of the law, which gives all courts of record a kind of discretionary power in the government of their own officers, that any such court may proceed in such manner against any such officer, not only for refusing to execute its commands, or for executing them irregularly, remissly, or oppressively, but also for all kinds of oppression or injustice done by them in the execution of their offices, or by color of them. . . . In what cases counselors are punishable in the manner above mentioned. It seems clear, that notwithstanding they are neither officers of any court, nor invested with any judicial office, but barely practice as counselor, yet inasmuch as they have a special privilege to practice the law, and their misbehavior tends to bring a disgrace upon the law itself, they are punishable for any foul practice as other ministers of justice are." 2 Hawk. P. O. chap. 22, §§ 1, 5, 12, 30.

"Attorneys and solicitors are to be considered as public officers and ministers of justice. Upon this ground it is that, in courts both of law and equity, they have stated fees allowed them for their service, and are under the government of the several courts in relation to their behavior to their clients. The courts exercise a much larger authority over them, and interfere much more in contracts which they make with their clients, than they do in other cases. . . . Upon this ground it is that if an attorney accepts a retainer from his client, and does not appear for him, the court will compel him to do it. . . . Attorneys and solicitors, when they have accepted retainers from their clients, are bound to serve them for the stated fees which are allowed by the several courts." Hardwicke, Ld. Ch. in Walmsley v. Booth, Barnard, Ch. 478, 479. "It is because attorneys and solicitors are regarded as officers of the court that our courts have been in the habit of granting relief against them by summary motion; treating the act as one of official misconduct in an officer of the court, and there to be redressed in the summary manner." Waters v. Whittemore, 22 Barb. 598, 595.

Merritt v. Lambert, 10 Paige, 852, 4 L. ed. 1007, "came before the chancellor upon an appeal of J. Wallis, one of the solicitors and counselors of this court, from an order of the vice-chancellor, . . . made upon the application of Loubat, who was a purchaser pendente lite of part of the property in litigation in this cause." The suit was brought by Merritt against Lambert for the specific performance of a contract to exchange lands, and the bill was dismissed. Wallis was originally employed by Lambert. During the pendency of the suit a receiver was appointed of the rents of Lambert's land, which rents came into the hands of Wallis when the bill was dismissed. Loubat had employed Wallis to defend the title to a part of that land. After the bill was dismissed, Loubat applied for an order that Wallis pay him his share of the rents. The vice-chancellor directed a reference to a master to ascertain and report the amount of the rents of Loubat's lot, received by Wallis, and also to ascertain and report what reasonable counsel fees should be allowed to Wallis, and that, upon the confirmation of the master's report, Wallis should pay Loubat the balance, if any, remaining in his hands after deducting taxable costs and reasonable counsel fees. Walworth, Ch., affirming this order, said: "The principles upon which the court proceeds in cases of this kind are stated . . . by Lord Hardwicke in Walmsley v. Booth, Barnard, Ch. 478. He there says attorneys and solicitors are to be considered as public officers and ministers of justice. . . . If an attorney extorts more money from his client than the courts allow of, or makes a contract with his client to have more money, the courts will give relief. . . . In England the duties of attorney or solicitor and counsel are always performed by different persons; and of course the attorney or solicitor cannot be permitted to stipulate for any greater compensation for his services than such as are allowed by the practice of the court, or by the tariff of fees fixed by law. The same rule prevails here, so far as relates to the mere services of an attorney or solicitor. But as most members of the profession practice in the capacity of counsel, as well as in that of solicitor or attorney, if the client agrees with his solicitor or attorney to perform the duty of counsel also, . . . the latter, in his character of counsel, may stipulate for a reasonable reward for his services as such counsel. . . . But he is not permitted, either as attorney or solicitor, or as counsel, to contract with his client . . . for a part of the demand or subject-matter of the litigation, as a compensation for his services." This statement of the law shows the ground of Chancellor Walworth's previous decision in Bleakley's Case, 5 Paige, 311, 3 L. ed. 731, and of his opinion, afterwards expressed in Ray v. Birdseye, 5 Denio, 619, 627, that "the attorney who issued the execution was a public officer appointed under the authority of this state."

In Leigh's Case, 1 Munf. 468 (decided in 1810), the question was whether an attorney-at-law was a person "appointed to any office or place, civil or military, under this commonwealth," within section 3 of an act to suppress dueling, which prescribed a certain oath to be taken by every such person. On his motion to be admitted to the bar of the supreme court of appeals without taking this oath, "Mr. Leigh insisted that the practice of law was not an office or place under the commonwealth, within the meaning of the act; that the act intended public officers only and not private ones of any kind. I agree, said he, 'it is laid down generally that attorneys-at-law, in England, are, in all points, officers of the respective courts in which they are admitted. 3 Bl. Com. 26. But their character of officers of court in England is derived from certain restrictions they are under, and privileges they enjoy, in that country, unknown in this. In England, attorneys cannot be bail in civil cases; nor can attorneys at law practice as solicitor in chancery; nor attorneys in one of the courts of Westminster in any other; nor can they be called to the bar till struck off the roll of attorneys; nor, if once admitted barristers, enrolled as attorneys again till disbarred at their inns of court. . . . On the other hand, attorneys cannot regularly be held to special bail. They must be sued by bill, not by original. They can only be sued in the courts they belong to, and they are exempt from serving in offices they may be elected to against their inclination. . . . Barristers at law (king's counsel excepted) . . . take no oath of office, and are not deemed officers of court. In Virginia, no such restrictions or privileges exist. Here, attorneys are counsel. In England, too, it was formerly held that attorneys were compellable to act. Co. Litt. 295a. But it has been since adjudged, that an attorney is not compellable to appear for any one unless he takes his fee, or back the warrant. Oades v. Woodward, 1 Salk. 87. And even if the law, as stated by Coke, has not been thus exploded, still counsel were never thought compellable to act. Hargraves' note, 252 to Co. Litt. 295a. And as, in Virginia, the characters of attorney and counsel are inseparably blended in the same person, so that one cannot be engaged as attorney without being engaged as counsel, in which latter capacity he is on no principle compellable to act, it results that no part of the profession is so compellable in this country. Attorneys therefore are no more officers of the court here than counsels are in England. A class of men there are, indeed, in this as well as in that country, concerned in the administration of justice, to whose diligence, integrity, ability and honor much is necessarily confided; . . . sworn to do their duty, regulated by rules of policy and practice, and liable to summary punishment and privation for unworthiness or misconduct. But these, their only traits of the officer known to our law, they have in common with jurors. . . . But granting that attorneys are on the same footing here as in England,—that they are officers of court,—still Mr. Leigh contended, they are not public 'officers,' within this act. 'In fixing the legal construction of this our test,' said he, 'I could not . . . forbear looking into the construction put by English legislators and lawyers on their corporation, test, and abjuration acts, which are known to have been enforced and interpreted, in a spirit that the most rigorous expounder of our test cannot except against.' . . . By the Abjuration Act (18 Wm. III. chap. 6) it was enacted 'that every person who shall bear any office, civil or military, . . . and all persons teaching pupils, etc., and all preachers, etc., and every person that shall act as a sergeant at law, counselor, barrister, advocate, attorney, solicitor, clerk, or notary by practising as such in any court, shall, within three months after they enter upon such office, or take upon them such practice,' take the oath of abjuration. . . . The alternative words 'or take upon them such practice' plainly referred to the legal characters before mentioned, and showed that the parliament did not deem their profession, nor was it generally understood to be, an office or place under government. If they had thought so, those words would not have been inserted. And by the corporation act (18 Car. II. Stat. 2, chap. 1) it was enacted 'that no person shall be placed or chosen in any office of mayor, alderman, recorder, bailiff, town clerk, common councilman, or other office of magistracy, place, trust, or employment, concerning the government of any city, borough, or cinque port, and their members, or other port town, that shall not, within one year next before such choice, have taken the oath of supremacy,' etc. . . . If any words would include the attorneys of corporation courts, as officers or placemen, those of this statute would. Yet it had been expressly adjudged that an attorney was not an 'officer,' within that act. Hurst's Case, T. Raym. 56, 94, Sid. 94, 152, and 1 Keb. 849, 854, 387, 558, 675. . . . In all the notices of this case, the only question ever raised was 24 L. R. A.

whether an attorneyship was such a place as that a mandamus would lie to restore one to it; . . . but no doubt was ever entertained that the attorney was not within the corporation act. . . . If the profession of the law be an office or place under the commonwealth at all, it is a lucrative one. Now, the constitution of Virginia expressly provides that all persons 'holding lucrative . . . offices shall be incapable of being elected members of either house of assembly or the privy council.' Article 4. If, then, the construction I am controverting be right, lawyers are excluded from the assembly and the council. Yet the framers of the constitution, . . . and their successors ever since, never (as we know) had any such idea. The whole practice of the constitution, from its origin to this day, the contemporaneous, the present, the constant exposition of it, refutes this inference . . . that attorneys are officers under government. . . . By the Constitution of the United States (art. 1, § 6, cl. 2), 'no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either house during his continuance in office.' Is it, or has it ever been, thought that hereby the bar of the federal courts are excluded from Congress? . . . By the Act of 1788 . . . 'all persons who shall hold any legislative, executive, or judicial office, or other lucrative office whatsoever, under the authority of the United States, shall be . . . incapable of holding . . . any legislative, executive, or judicial office, or other lucrative office whatsoever under the government of this commonwealth.' And by the Act of 1799, . . . 'no person holding or occupying any office or place, or any commission or appointment whatsoever, civil or military, under the authority of the United States, whether any pay or emolument be attached to such office, place, commission, or appointment, or otherwise, . . . shall be capable of being elected to or holding any office, legislative, executive, or judicial, or any other office, place, or appointment of trust or profit, under the government of this commonwealth.' If lawyers in the state courts are officers or placemen under the commonwealth, lawyers in the federal courts are so under the United States, and are . . . excluded not only from all political and military state offices, but from the state bar also. . . . It never occurred as a possible opinion, that lawyers of the state or federal bar are officers under the state or federal government. . . . Mr. Leigh knew of only two objections to his argument, which had been deduced from our own laws and usages. One was that, under a general provision that all officers of government shall take the oath of allegiance, the members of the bar, state and federal, have been always held bound to take that oath; that is, they have been held to be officers under government. But this objection . . . was founded upon a plain mistake; . . . it was not from any such reasoning or inference, but from positive and express provision that the profession had been required to take the oath of allegiance to the state or to the Union. . . . Another objection was that the Act of 1792 (chap. 71, § 2) directs that counsel and attorneys 'shall take an oath of office,' namely, 'I do solemnly swear that I will honestly demean myself in the practice of the law as counsel or attorney, and will in all respects execute my office according to the best of my knowledge and abilities.' This objection . . . begged the whole question.

The lawyer swears he will execute his office. What office? The practice of the law. And this brought it back to the first point,—the nature of that office. 'Office' there meant no more than 'duty.' . . . In a large sense, an attorney-at-law is an officer, so is an attorney in fact, an administrator, a physician, and who not? In the largest sense, every duty is an office. . . . The question here is not whether the practice of the law be an office, but whether it be, as the chief justice says (King v. Burrell, 5 Mod. 432), a public office or not.

"Judge Tucker. On a former day of this term, Mr. Leigh, a gentleman who has practiced as an attorney and counsel for several years in the district courts, county courts, and court of chancery, made a motion to be permitted to practice in this court. A question was propounded whether he must take the oath prescribed by the act of the last session for the suppression of dueling. I was of opinion that he could not be permitted to practice in this court without taking that oath. My opinion was founded upon these principles: That an attorney-at-law is a public officer; that his license is only an inchoate step to office; that he becomes an officer in that court only in which he qualifies as the law directs; that his admission to practice in one court does not authorize him to practice in any other court; . . .

. . . that such an admission was equivalent to an appointment, inasmuch as he thereby becomes an officer of that particular court. . . .

In England an attorney-at-law is considered as a public officer; otherwise a mandamus would not lie to restore him. The whole context of our act concerning counsel and attorneys-at-law, between whom there is no distinction in this country, proves the same thing. . . .

They are subject to penalties to which no private citizen could possibly be subjected. Let a single example suffice: The lawyers practicing in the inferior courts may demand for an opinion or advice, where no suit is brought, or prosecuted or defended, by the attorney giving such advice, but not otherwise, $1.67; those in the general court, $3.58, for advice, under the same restrictions. And every lawyer exacting, taking, receiving, or demanding any greater fee or other reward is subjected to a heavy penalty. Under what color or pretext could the legislature impose a penalty on any other than a public officer for demanding and receiving $100 or $1,000, or any other sum whatever, for giving his advice to any person willing to pay for it? . . . Whether the legislature, the executive, or the court appoints or admits to an office, the office or place is held or exercised under the authority of the commonwealth. . . .

"Judge Roane. . . . An attorney is defined to be one who is set in the place of another, and he is either public, as an attorney-at-law, or private, as being delegated to act for another in private contracts or agreements. 1 Bacon, Abr. 287; Co. Litt. 52. With respect to these public attorneys or attorneys-at-law, in order to insure a due degree of probity and knowledge in their profession so indispensable to persons acting in that character, none are permitted to act as such but those who are allowed by the judges to be skilled in the law, and certified by the court of the county of their residence to be persons of honesty, probity, and good demeanor. As a further guard against improper practices in their profession, they are required to take the oath prescribed by the act upon this subject. . . .

Having obtained the sanction of these two tribunals touching these two particulars, an attorney is licensed or allowed to practice; and the courts have also a continuing control over them, with power to revoke their licenses for unworthy practices or behavior. But the licensing judges cannot be said to 'elect' or 'appoint' an attorney. He can, perhaps, only be said to be appointed by the particular clients, who, after he is licensed, may severally employ him. This result is entirely justified by a view of the act 'concerning attorneys at law and counsel,' . . . in which these functionaries are nowhere said to be elected or appointed, either by the government or the licensing judges; nor are their functions anywhere called or designated as 'offices' in the act, except in the form of the oath prescribed to be taken; and even there that term may well be taken in a general and extended sense, as synonymous with 'duty.' The act, it is true, prescribes an oath to be taken as aforesaid, previous to being allowed to practice; but that can only be considered . . .

as an additional security for the good conduct of the attorney. It would be too much to say that this single circumstance of precaution (any more than those of the license and certificate of the county court before mentioned) shall exalt that functionary into an 'officer,' when he is neither said in the law to be appointed to any office, nor to hold any office, and when he receives no salary or emolument except the fees which individual citizens may please to give him. If this single circumstance should be construed to have that effect, it might be equally argued to have a similar effect in relation to jurors. . . . It is not necessary in this case to consider whether, and in what degree, attorneys are considered in this country (as they are in England) officers of their respective courts, though it is easy to see that, an attorney in this country not having as many privileges as the English attorneys, in consideration of which that character is there holden to attach, a difference may probably exist in this country in this particular. . . .

Even admitting . . . that attorneys are, in some sense and in some degree, officers of their several courts, as they are held to be in England, the question still recurs, Are they 'officers,' within the meaning of the act to suppress dueling? . . . The second section declares that a person accepting a challenge, etc., 'shall be incapable of holding or being elected to any post of profit, trust, or emolument, civil or military, under the government of this commonwealth.' It relates as well to persons now in office as to those to be elected thereto. . . .

The former must have been elected. . . . This part of the clause . . . excludes attorneys-at-law, who . . . are neither elected nor appointed to office, but are merely permitted to practice by those who are constituted by law judges of their character and qualifications. Admitting . . . that attorneys are to be considered as officers, they are only considered, even in England, . . . as officers of their respective courts. 1 Bacon, Abr. 287. They do not therefore come up to the desideratum of this act; they are not officers under the government of the commonwealth. There is no just ground on which we can erect, by implication or construction, into governmental officers, those who, in England, are not exalted to that character, and who, in the only books and doctrines handed to us on the subject from that country, are held, at most, to be mere subordinate officers of their respective courts. But if attorneys could be even considered as officers of the government, they do not hold an office of profit or emolument under the government (or in other words, a lucrative office); otherwise they would have been excluded from a seat in the legislature by the provisions of the constitution. . . . The words of the oath . . . 'during my continuance in office' seem to indicate those public offices which are held by commission or appointment, and are wont and proper to be resigned. They do not naturally apply to a function which is never resigned or formally given up, which it is the right of one citizen to exercise at the request and for the benefit of another, and in respect to which the regulating hand of the legislature has only interposed for the salutary purposes before mentioned. . . . It has never been pretended (although attorneys, when they practice in the state courts, thereby become officers of the commonwealth, they equally become officers of the general government when they practice in the federal courts) that the attorneys practicing in the latter courts cannot also practice in the former.

"Judge Fleming. . . . Practitioners of the law are not comprehended in the act, under these words 'every person who shall be appointed to any office or place, civil or military, under the commonwealth, shall, in addition to the oath now prescribed by law, take the following oath,' etc. The practice of the law is a profession which every citizen of the state, having complied with certain requisites, . . . may take up, engage in, and exercise according to his own will and pleasure, and which he may lay down and resume as often as to him may seem convenient, without any responsibility for his conduct in so doing. . . . The officer taking the oath, after swearing 'that he hath not been engaged in a duel,' . . . is further to swear that 'he will not be so concerned, directly or indirectly, in such duel, during his continuance in office,' which . . . has no allusion to practitioners of the law."

Mr. Leigh was therefore admitted without taking the oath.

In Byrne v. Stewart (decided in 1812) 3 Desauss. Eq. 466, it was held that the office of a solicitor in a court of chancery is not a public office. "He is not appointed by the legislature," says Chancellor Watkins (pages 478, 479), "nor is he amenable to it, for he does not possess any portion of the public authority. His admission to practice is indeed regulated by law, but it is in the power of any man who will comply with the legal requisites to become a solicitor, independently of the will of the legislature. He can be considered in no other light than that of a private agent for the citizens of the country who may employ him to do their legal business in the courts; and although the law requires of him certain qualifications, and he receives a license from the judges, yet his office is no more a public one than would be any other profession or trade which the legislature might choose to subject to similar regulations, and which is the practice in many other countries."

"The 'Act to Suppress Duelling' [passed in 1816] . . . requires 'every member of the senate or of the assembly, and every person who shall be elected or appointed to any office or place, civil or military, except town officers, and every person who shall be admitted a counsellor, attorney, or solicitor, . . . to take an oath that he has not been engaged in a duel.' A new section of the Constitution of 1821 'ordains that members of the legislature, and all officers, executive and judicial, . . . shall take . . . an oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of the United States, and the constitution of this state, and also faithfully to discharge the duties of his office; and that 'no other oath, declaration, or test shall be required as a qualification for any office or public trust.' The question now presented is whether the new constitution has repealed the provision of the act to suppress dueling in regard to the oath required to be taken by attorneys and counselors of this court. The point is simply whether an attorney or counselor holds an office or public trust in the sense of the constitution. Lexicographers generally, define 'office' to mean 'public employment;' and I apprehend its legal meaning to be an employment on behalf of the government, in any station or public trust, not merely transient, occasional, or incidental. In common parlance, the term 'office' has a more general signification. Thus, we say the office of executor or guardian or the office of a friend. In my judgment, an attorney or counselor does not hold an office, but exercises a privilege or franchise. As attorneys or counselors, they perform no duties on behalf of the government; they execute no public trust. They enjoy the exclusive privilege of prosecuting and defending suits for clients who may choose to employ them. Various classes of persons are licensed in the city of New York, with an exclusive privilege in their employment; yet they are not public officers. Physicians are also licensed, pursuant to statutes; yet they hold no office or public trust, in legal construction. Lawyers are licensed to practice in one of the learned professions, and physicians in another, and there are many regulations by law for their government as distinct orders of men in society; but they are not trustees nor agents for the public, any more than persons licensed to carry on the business of banking. The fees of attorneys are fixed by law; and so is the compensation of cartmen and bakers, and ferrymen. . . . The legislature, in framing the act to suppress dueling, have discriminated between public officers and attorneys and counselors. They provide, not only that 'persons elected or appointed to any office or place, civil or military,' but that 'persons admitted' as counselors and attorneys, shall take the oath: thus, by fair inference, giving an exposition which shows that lawyers, in their contemplation, were not public officers. I am therefore of opinion that the new constitution has not abrogated the provision of the act which required attorneys and counselors to take this oath." Platt, J., in Re Oaths to be Taken by Attorneys & Counselors, 20 Johns. 492-494. Woodworth, J., concurred. Spencer, Ch. J., dissented.

In Seymour v. Ellison, 2 Cow. 18, 28, 29, Spencer, Ch. J., expressed the opinion that an attorney holds an office within the sense of the constitutional provision that "neither the chancellor, nor justices of the supreme court, nor any circuit judge, shall hold any other office or public trust."

"So far as the legal profession is an occupation open to all, there is no reason to consider a lawyer as a public officer. The exercise of this profession is in part an occupation, in which every person is free to engage; but it is not so in respect to proceedings in the courts of justice. These proceedings are, according to our laws and usages, conducted by a distinct class of men specially appointed for this service. The practice of the law in the courts of justice is permitted only to those who are appointed by the courts. The persons appointed are subject to the control of the courts, and they may be deprived of their right to pursue this occupation. These regulations evidently consider the practice of the law in the courts as a part of the administration of justice,—as a function important, not merely to private parties, but also to the public. They are regulations which are supposed to be necessary or conducive to a good administration of public justice. The admission of an attorney, solicitor, or counselor is a general appointment to conduct causes before the courts. This station, thus conferred by public authority, has its peculiar powers, privileges, and duties; and this station thus becomes an office in the administration of justice. Attorneys, solicitors, and counselors are constantly denominated 'officers' of the courts by which they are appointed. Our laws have required that upon their admission they should take a particular oath for the faithful discharge of their duties, and that oath is termed, by the legislature itself, an 'oath of office.' In this, as in other regulations, the legislature have considered and treated persons appointed to practice the law as holding a species of office. . . . The constitution of the Union requires that all executive and judicial officers of the United States and of the several states shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support that constitution. The Supreme Court of the United States have directed that counselors and attorneys admitted to practice in that court shall take an oath or affirmation to demean themselves uprightly, and also to support the Constitution of the United States. Rule of February term, 1790, and rule of February term, 1791. Attorneys and counselors are thus considered by that court as officers of the United States, under the national constitution. . . . The obvious intention of the existing constitution [of New York] is to establish one oath for all offices and for every public trust; and I am accordingly of opinion . . . that no other oath can be required." Sanford, Ch., in Wood's Case, Hopk. Ch. 7, 8, 2 L. ed. 828.

"The general assembly shall have power to pass such penal laws to suppress the evil practice of dueling, extending to disqualification from office or the tenure thereof, as they may deem expedient. Every person shall be disqualified from holding any office, or place of honor or profit, under the authority of the state, who shall be convicted of having given or offered any bribe to procure his election or appointment. Laws shall be made to exclude from office, from suffrage and from serving as jurors those who shall hereafter be convicted of . . . high crimes or misdemeanors." Alabama Const. 1819, art. 6. §§ 3-5. An act, passed in 1826, requiring "all members of the general assembly, . . . and all officers and public functionaries, . . . and attorneys and counselors at law," to take an oath that they had taken no part in a duel since January 1, 1826, and would take no part therein during their continuance in office or in the discharge of any public function; and provided that "any attorney or counselor at law, failing or refusing to take the said oath, shall not be permitted to practice as such in any court in this state."

In Dorsey's Case, 7 Port. (Ala.) 293, it was held by a majority of the court that the requirement of this oath was not a constitutional method of disqualification.

"Goldthwaite, J. . . . If a statute excluded from office one convicted of a particular offense, and used no other term of designation, I should not hesitate to decide that the profession of a lawyer was not included within the meaning of the term as generally used, because he can no more be said to hold an office than one who pursues the profession of a physician, the avocation of a teacher, or who discharges the functions of an administrator or guardian. But if I were called on to declare that the constitution, by these express grants, has not invested the general assembly with power to exclude from the exercise of these or similar professions, I confess I should very much doubt the propriety of such a construction. The present inclination of my judgment is that those terms are sufficiently comprehensive to include all avocations, franchises, professions, or functions which are public in their nature, and which therefore may affect the constitution and well-being of society. . . . This act provides a mode of ascertaining and punishing guilt, which is . . . in direct contravention . . . of the declaration of rights. [Pages 365, 367.] . . .

"Ormond, J. . . . The first question . . . is whether the privilege or right to practice law is an office, within the meaning of article 6, section 8. The word 'office' has two meanings; the one popular, the other legal and technical. Thus we speak of the office of an executor, guardian, etc. The legal meaning of the term always implies 'a charge, or trust, conferred by public authority, and for a public purpose.' It is most unlikely that in framing a constitution of government its authors should have used a word of the importance of this, technical in its nature, . . . in a loose or popular sense. . . . 'Extending to disqualification from office, or the tenure thereof,' is quite conclusive of its meaning; for with no propriety of language could the tenure of an office be spoken of, unless it were an office of public trust. . . . Under the head of 'Impeachments,' we find that the governor and all civil officers shall be liable to impeachment for any misdemeanor in office. The term is general,—all civil officers,—and must embrace all persons holding an office within the purview of any constitutional regulation or restriction; yet no one, we apprehend, would contend that for malpractice, or for other good and sufficient cause, an attorney-at-law must be removed by impeachment before the senate. [Pages 371, 372.] . . . Collier, Ch. J. [dissenting]. . . . A license to practice law confers a mere franchise or privilege. . . . It is conditional, depending for its efficacy upon taking the oaths prescribed by law. . . . Nor does an attorney and counselor at law, as such, hold an office under the government. . . . Taking the law to have been correctly adjudged in the cases cited from 20 Johns. and 1 Munf., an attorney may be said to hold a privilege or profession. . . . Such only as are charged with the interests of the public are officers within the meaning of the constitution." Pages 392-394, 413.

In Faulkner's Case, 1 W. Va. 269, it was held by a majority of the court that an attorney-at-law was not an officer within the meaning of an Act of 1863, requiring "every person elected or appointed to any office" to take an oath that he had voluntarily given no aid or comfort to persons engaged in armed hostility against the United States. "Brown, J. . . . Whenever it was the legislative intention to embrace attorneys-at-law, they are named as such; and, when not so intended, they are not so named, and are not included by the general terms 'all officers elected or appointed.' . . . It would seem to be the settled understanding . . . that attorneys-at-law were not officers of the government, either state or national, elected or appointed, within the meaning of any of said acts relative to officers, civil or military; but, on the contrary, that they were a profession or class sui generis; and, though called officers of courts, yet never in the sense of these acts, nor intended to be embraced by them." Page 285.

A California statute provided that "no attorney-at-law shall be permitted to practice . . . until he shall have taken and filed" an oath "that I have not, since April 25, 1863 [the date of the passage of the act], knowingly aided, encouraged, countenanced, or assisted, nor will I hereafter in any manner aid, encourage, countenance, or assist, the so called confederate states, or any of them, in their rebellion." "It is insisted that the statute violates section 8 of article 20 of the Constitution of this state," which requires members of the legislature, and all officers, executive and judicial, "to take an oath to support the constitutions, state and federal, and to faithfully discharge the duties of their office, and provides that "no other oath, declaration, or test shall be required as a qualification for any office or public trust." "It is insisted that an attorney-at-law is an 'officer'; that the privilege he exercises is an 'office,' within the intent and meaning of this section; and that the affidavit required by the statute in question is another and a different oath, in the nature of a test oath, imposed as a qualification for the office; and that the law therefore conflicts with the constitution. . . . To construe this section to mean that a lawyer is an officer, would directly conflict with the well-established meaning of other provisions in which the word 'officer' is used. Thus, if it is an office, it is one of profit; and an impeached officer would be disqualified from practicing the profession, under section 19 of article 4; and senators and assemblymen who should vote to regulate attorneys' fees would be excluded from practicing law by section 20; and a lawyer, admitted to practice under the laws of the United States, would be a 'person holding a lucrative office under the United States,' and would not 'be eligible to any civil office of profit under this state,' and so would be excluded from practicing in our state courts, or holding any office, by section 21, and could not be governor, under section 12, article 5. If it is an office, it is liable to become 'vacant' by death, resignation, removal from the state, or otherwise, and would be governed by section 8 of article 5 [which authorizes the governor to fill vacancies]. If it is an office, a lawyer must be a 'judicial officer,' for his duties relate mainly to courts of justice; and he has always been termed an officer of the court. He would, therefore, be precluded from receiving 'to his own use any fees or perquisites of office.' Article 6, § 15. . . . If he is an officer, he must be elected or appointed, as required by section 6 of article 11, and the duration of the office cannot exceed four years, as prescribed by section 7 of article 11. . . . Attorneys are officers of the court, and as such are subject to the control of the court before which they practice, which has power to summarily investigate the dealings and transactions between them and their clients, . . . as also to disbar them for misconduct and deprive them of the privilege of practicing their profession. The books are full of decisions in which they are termed officers in this sense. And in some cases the courts have said arguendo that they are 'public officers,' on the ground that they receive stated fees, fixed by statute, and are subject to the control of the court. . . . But none of the cases we have been referred to hold directly, as a point actually decided, . . . that they are 'officers,' or 'public officers,' within the legal meaning of those terms when used in statutes and constitutions, except Wood's Case in Hopk. Ch. 7, 2 L. ed. 323, which is clearly overruled by the numerous cases to the contrary. We therefore hold that an attorney-at-law is not an officer, within the meaning of that term as used in the constitution." Cohen v. Wright, 23 Cal. 293, 307, 314, 315, 329.

A Tennessee statute made it the duty of all courts, "at every term for two years, to call before them all the officers thereof, who shall be sworn, and have this act read or explained to them." Laws 1868, p. 19, § 5. "Although in one sense an attorney is an officer of the court, yet that he does not belong to the class of officers referred to in this section is too clear to admit of discussion. . . . The idea that the legislature ever intended that the judges should call before them . . . all the attorneys of their respective courts, and have the acts of assembly read or explained to them, and have them sworn to disclose, as common informers, all their knowledge as to persons . . . who have been guilty of the offenses in the act commonly known as the Ku-klux law, is so palpably absurd that it cannot be entertained for a moment. The language of the act plainly indicates that it was intended . . . to apply only to those persons who held offices, and who were subject to the orders of the court, but not to attorneys, who hold no office, and who are not subject to the order of the court, except in well defined instances." Ingersoll v. Howard, 1 Heisk. 247, 254.

In Re Thomas, 16 Colo. 441, 446, 447, 18 L. R. A. 538, the question arose whether a constitutional provision prohibiting the election or appointment to any civil or military office of any person except a qualified elector excluded women from the bar. "Attorneys at law," says the court, "are constantly spoken of as 'officers of the court.' The designation is not inaccurate. Their special researches and general legal knowledge enable them to aid the courts, and thus to contribute towards the due administration of justice. The office is, therefore, an important one, and the attorney incidentally performs a quasi public duty. But admission to the profession is purely a private matter, and is secured solely for the advancement of private interests. By virtue of such admission attorneys are not required to perform specific public acts, nor are specified duties devolved upon them in behalf of the general public. The duties they assume, and the labor they perform, are usually in pursuance of personal contracts with private litigants. . . . Our conclusion is that attorneys at law are not per se civil officers within the meaning of the constitutional phrase under consideration. . . . That instrument . . . contains nothing inconsistent with the admission of women to the bar."

A statute requiring locomotive engineers to be licensed, after examination as to competency and fitness, by a board appointed by the governor is a police regulation providing "a proper mode of preserving the safety of the traveling public and other persons whose lives may be imperiled by the negligence of ignorant and incompetent engineers. . . . Laws providing by accustomed modes for the licensing of physicians, lawyers, pilots, butchers, bakers, liquor dealers, and in fact all trades, professions, and callings, interfere with no natural rights of the citizen secured by the constitution." McDonald v. State, 81 Ala. 279, 60 Am. Rep. 150. The legislature may be of opinion that the public welfare requires a reasonable degree of skill and trustworthiness in physicians and lawyers, as well as in pilots, and that their business should not be carried on by persons to whom important interests cannot be safely intrusted. Statutes have authorized the selection of persons qualified for various employments, and the grant of licenses as evidence of their qualifications, and excluded all who did not obtain this evidence. Such regulations, adopted as a means of protecting the public against incapacity and unfitness, do not necessarily transform the licensee's business into a public office in such a sense as to exclude women. A legislative purpose to introduce a sexual test, and extend the legal disabilities of women, cannot be implied from a mere requirement of a license as a certificate that the holder is competent for a specified work. If the work is such as our common law allows a woman to do, the requirement of a license is no more evidence of an intent to disqualify women than of an intent to disqualify men. "It shall not be lawful for any person to practice medicine, surgery, or midwifery, unless such person shall have obtained a license . . . stating that he is qualified in the branches of the medical profession named in said license. Every medical society . . . shall . . . elect a board of censors, . . . which board shall have authority to examine and license persons to practice medicine, surgery, or midwifery." Gen. Laws, chap. 132, §§ 1, 2. "The object of the statute is protection to the public from incompetent and unworthy physicians and surgeons. . . . Authority to examine and license as expressed in the statute, means authority to license, when, upon examination of the candidate as to his medical education, skill, and experience, the censors are satisfied that he possesses the necessary qualifications for the important and responsible occupation of a medical practitioner. . . . The license is, in effect, a certificate that the holder possesses the necessary medical and other qualifications." Gage v. Censors of New Hampshire Electric Medical Soc. 63 N. H. 92, 94, 56 Am. Rep. 492. "The purpose of the statute is to protect the public from the imposture and fraud of quacks and charlatans." State v. Pennoyer, 65 N. H. 113, 116, 5 L. R. A. 709.

The Liquor Law of 1838 (chap. 369) prohibited the sale of wine and spirits without license from the selectmen. One object of the act was "to place the trade in liquors . . . in the hands of suitable persons to be intrusted with such business." Pierce v. State, 13 N. H. 536, 582, 583. The Act of 1791, "regulating licensed houses," provides that no person shall exercise the business of a taverner or retailer of wines or spirits without license; and "that if the selectmen shall unreasonably neglect or refuse to license any suitable person applying therefor, such person, and suitable persons in towns and places where there are no selectmen, may apply to the court of general sessions of the peace, . . . who may, if they think proper, license such persons." One object of the statute was "to prevent improper persons from opening taverns." Wason v. Serrance, 2 N. H. 501, 503. The Act of 1715 (Laws 1726, p. 57; Laws 1771, p. 57) presents the distinction between a public office and a business that cannot be carried on without a license. "No person," says the act, "who is or shall be licensed to be an innholder, taverner, common victualler, or retailer, shall suffer any apprentice, servant, or negro to sit drinking in his or her house, or to have any manner of drink there, without special order or allowance of their respective master. . . . Neither shall any licensed person suffer any inhabitant of such towns where he dwells, or coming thither from any other town, to sit drinking or tippling after ten o'clock at night in his or her house, . . . or to continue there above the space of two hours (other than travelers, persons upon business, or extraordinary occasions). . . . And no person or persons licensed as aforesaid shall suffer any person to drink to drunkenness or excess in his or her house, nor shall suffer any person as his or her guest to be and remain in such house, . . . on the Lord's day other than strangers, travelers, or such as come thither for necessary refreshments. And for the better inspecting of licensed houses, and the discovery of such persons as shall presume to sell without license, . . . the selectmen . . . shall take due care tythingmen be annually chosen at the general meeting for choice of town officers: . . . whose duty it shall be carefully to inspect all licensed houses, and to inform of" various police offenses (with power to call offenders before a justice of the peace, and to command assistance); "every of which tythingmen shall be sworn . . . to the faithful discharge of his office," and shall have "a badge of his office. . . . If any person, being duly chosen to the said office, shall refuse to take his oath, or serve therein, he shall forfeit . . . forty shillings."

The position of a licensed attorney, like that of a licensed physician or a teacher of a public school, has a certain official character directly derived from the law. "An attorney is a public officer. Admission to and expulsion from his office are regulated by law. He takes an official oath. The public is entitled to ample protection against the danger of any abuse of the great powers of the office which the public, by its agents, has conferred upon him. The legislature could not have intended to . . . require another branch of the government to continue to hold him out to the world as worthy of confidence when the holding out becomes false and fraudulent." Delano's Case, 58 N. H. 5, 6, 42 Am. Rep. 556; Kimball's Case, 64 Me. 140, 146. Women would not be barred from practicing medicine or teaching school by a statute requiring an official oath, and a certificate from a judicial tribunal holding them out as worthy of confidence and employment in those callings. Attorneys "constitute a profession essential to society. Their aid is required, not merely to represent suitors before the courts, but in the more difficult transactions of private life. The highest interests are placed in their hands and confided to their management. The confidence which they receive, and the responsibilities which they are obliged to assume, demand not only ability of a high order, but the strictest integrity." Randall v. Brigham, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 523, 540, 19 L. ed. 285, 293. "Anything that tends to lower the standard of professional acquirements among those whose duty it is to investigate and defend the rights of others is to be lamented. Every man may be a plaintiff or defendant. Every man may have a right to enforce, or an unjust claim to resist. . . . When he applies to an attorney for advice, he should have security, from the attorney's previous study of his profession, that he is reasonably competent to discharge his trust. There is no class of men whose advice in their particular calling is more generally followed than the class of attorneys. More implicit confidence is reposed in them, for personal honor and devotion to their duties, than in any other persons. Secrets involving all that renders life valuable are confided to them upon the mere security and belief that they will not violate a professional confidence. Evidences of debt and of rights to property are placed in their hands, for whose return other security than their professional trust is rarely required. It is even more important for the interest of the public than of the attorneys that this high character should continue to be deserved as it has been," and that they should be mentally and morally competent to act as legal advisers and draughtsmen, and "to take charge of litigated cases in court, involving, as they do, the life, liberty, reputation, and property of so many of their fellow citizens." Bryant's Case, 24 N. H. 149, 153, 158.

Notwithstanding the importance and official character of an attorney's vocation, it is not generally regarded as a public office; and the question whether, in the work of his profession, he takes an official part in the government of the state, for which women are disqualified by the common law, must be determined by the nature of the employment, and not by the verbal test of his being called an officer of the court. A common carrier "is in the exercise of a sort of public office, and has public duties to perform. . . . He is bound to receive and carry all the goods offered for transportation." New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants Bank of Boston, 47 U. S. 6 How. 344, 382, 12 L. ed. 465, 482; Sandford v. Centawise, W. & E. R. Co. 24 Pa. 378, 381, 64 Am. Dec. 667. "Like an innkeeper, he holds a sort of official relation to the public. He is bound to carry at reasonable rates. . . . He cannot refuse to carry a proper article, . . . on the offer of the usual reasonable compensation. . . . When he undertakes the business of a common carrier, he assumes this relation to the public, and he is not at liberty to decline the duties and responsibilities of his place, as they are defined and fixed by law." Moses v. Boston & M. Railroad, 24 N. H. 71, 88, 55 Am. Dec. 232; McDuffie v. Portland & R. Railroad, 53 N. H. 430, 448, 18 Am. Rep. 72. "Railroads, . . . like other highways, are public." Gen. Laws, chap. 160, § 1. "Yet the officers who manage them . . . are not public officers," within the meaning of a constitutional requirement that the legislature "shall fix the term of office, and the compensation of all officers." Walker v. Cincinnati, 21 Ohio St. 14, 8 Am. Rep. 24. Women are not excluded from a carrier's business by a public and official character. "Offices, which are a right to exercise a public or private employment, and to take the fees and emoluments thereunto belonging, are also incorporeal hereditaments; whether public, as those of magistrates, or private, as of bailiffs, receivers, and the like." 2 Bl. Com. 86. "Offices . . . consist in a right, and corresponding duty, to execute a public or private trust, and to take the emoluments belonging to it." 3 Kent, Com. 454. "If a man grant by his deed to another the office of parkership of a park, to have and occupy the same office for term of his life, the estate which he hath in the office is upon condition in law, to wit, that the parker shall well and lawfully keep the park." Litt. Ten.

lib. 3, § 378. "In this section Littleton putteth an example of a condition in law annexed to the office of the keeper of a park, but this example must be understood with a distinction; for, if the parker doth not attend on the park one or two, etc., days, this is no forfeiture of the office of parkership; but if, in his default, any deer be killed, and so a damage to the lord, that is a forfeiture, for . . . nonuser of itself, without some special damage, is no forfeiture of private offices, but nonuser of public offices, which concern the administration of justice or the commonwealth, is of itself a cause of forfeiture." Co. Litt. 233a; Shrewsbury's Case, 9 Coke, 42, 50; People v. Kingston & M. Turnp. Road Co. 23 Wend. 193, 207, 208, 85 Am. Dec. 551. "Public offices are held upon the implied condition that the officer will . . . execute the duties belonging to them, and . . . if the officer refuses or neglects to exercise the functions of the office for so long a period as to reasonably warrant the presumption that he does not desire or intend to perform the duties of the office at all, he will be held to have abandoned it." Mech. Pub. Off. § 485; 18 Cruise, Dig. 182. "As a city physician . . . is, by virtue of his office, a member of the board of health, which is invested with important powers to be exercised for the safety and health of the people, he is a public officer, and the title to his office can be tried by . . . a quo warranto." Com. v. Swasey, 183 Mass. 538, 541. "Quo warranto will lie for usurping any office, whether created by charter alone, or by the crown, with the consent of parliament, provided the office be of a public nature, and a substantive office, not merely the function or employment of a deputy or servant, held at the will and pleasure of others." Darley v. Queen, 12 Clark & F. 520. "An office, such as to properly come within the legitimate scope of a quo warranto information, may be defined as a public position, to which a portion of the sovereignty of the country . . . attaches for the time being, and which is exercised for the benefit of the public." The jurisdiction covers "a great variety of offices of a public nature, both elective and appointive, whose functions partake of an executive, ministerial, legislative, or judicial character." High, Extr. Legal Rem. §§ 620, 625, 626. The professional business of an attorney has not been understood to be an office within the law of abandonment and quo warranto. "One Edward Hurst, an attorney of the town court of Canterbury, being turned out by the commissioners within the late act for corporations, moved now for a mandamus. . . . It was suggested that it is a place concerning the administration of justice. . . . The court being divided in opinion, no writ could be had." Hurst's Case, T. Raym. 57. "A mandamus was granted in the case of Hurst, . . . and upon the return of the writ, restitution was granted, because an attorney is not such an office of which the commissioners for corporations have a power to intermeddle." Id. 94. An attorney admitted to practice in a federal court is an officer of that court. In that sense, his position is an "office under the United States;" but it is not an "office" within the meaning of the Federal Constitution (art. 1, § 6), or the State Constitution, art. 94. He "is not a civil, governmental, or public officer. He is not a holder of an office of public trust, within the meaning of the constitutions. . . . He is simply an officer of the court." Weeks, Attorneys at Law, 81. "Public office" is sometimes used in a broad sense, synonymous with public duty." Henly v. Lyme, 5 Bing. 91, was case against a municipal corporation for not repairing sea walls according to the condition of a grant to it from the king. "If a man," says Best, Oh. J., "takes a reward—whatever be the nature of that reward, whether it be in money from the crown, whether it be in land from the crown, whether it be in lands or money from any individual—for the discharge of a public duty, that instant he becomes a public officer; and if, by any act of negligence or any act of abuse in his office, any individual sustains an injury, that individual is entitled to redress in a civil action. If that be so, then it is quite clear that the plaintiff in this case is entitled to maintain this action." See Folts v. Kerlin, 105 Ind. 221, 223, 55 Am. Rep. 197. This definition does not include attorneys at-law. The obligation to render public service, which the law imposes upon common carriers, and which is one of the ordinary characteristics of public office, is not an element in the business of the legal profession. "An attorney is neither a public officer nor an officer of the court in the sense in which a prosecuting attorney, a clerk, a sheriff, or coroner is an officer. . . . In the mere practice of his profession he is not in the receipt either of a salary or fees allowed by law, but is simply engaged in a private pursuit. Consequently his particular services cannot be required without compensation." Ex parte Harrison, 112 Ind. 329, 333. On this point the authorities are conflicting. Cooley, Const. Lim. 406, 486. In this state an attorney is not compellable to engage in general or special practice, or to render any professional service, upon tender of compensation. "It seems like a solecism to regard that to be an office, in this country, to which there are no duties assigned" (Com. v. Gamble, 62 Pa. 343, 1 Am. Rep. 422), and in which an unlimited number of incumbents may remain during life, legally qualified, and amply competent in fact, but refusing every request to perform official service, without incurring censure or liability, or being guilty of official neglect. If public office is erroneously defined as including duty, the inquiry may be merely whether a license to practice law is an appointment to a place of governmental power. Whether that power is or is not necessarily accompanied by duty, a right to exercise it, in its electoral or official form, is not conferred upon women by the common law of this state.

In Rome and England and elsewhere, women have not been lawyers. The usage may have been regarded as universal law, but it is not conclusive on the question of legality. The callings followed by women have multiplied without legislation, and there are others in which they are not found, but in which they can lawfully engage. Without a statutory or common-law rule closing any branch of any profession against them, public sentiment, based on prevailing views of natural law and public policy, might be practically equivalent to a legislative prohibition. "The paramount destiny and mission of women are to fulfill the noble and benign offices of wife and mother. This is the law of the Creator. And the rules of civil society must be adapted to the general constitution of things." Bradley, Swayne, and Field, Jf., in Bradwell v. Illinois, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 180, 141, 21 L. ed. 442, 446. Men authorized to admit women to the bar, or to practice as attorneys, might deem it inexpedient to try the experiment. In certain social conditions the legal question would not be likely to arise. Its first appearance would be expected in this age, and in this country. With a universal opinion that the practice of law is not an employment fit for women, and with such a view of consequences as was expressed in Goodell's Case, 39 Wis. 232, 20 Am. Rep. 42, the question in the minds of benchers and courts would be, not whether women could lawfully be admitted, but whether they could lawfully be kept out. When it was held that it could not be necessary that Mrs. Cobbett "should come into court [in behalf of her husband, who was absent and in custody] to wrangle at nisi prius and engage in scenes inconsistent with the character of her sex," it would not have been considered necessary or advisable that women should engage, professionally and habitually, in scenes thus described.

The principle by which the question of judicial power to grant the petition in this case is to be determined seems plain and simple, however difficult may be its application to other cases nearer the line that separates official from nonofficial employments. By our common law, women do not vote in town meeting. The reason is that voting is an exercise of governmental power. For the same reason, and by the same law, they do not hold public office. The reason of the rule does not exclude them from an occupation in which they would take no official part in the government of the country. The question is whether an attorney-at-law is an officer of government within the reason and purpose of the rule. If a licensed attorney, being a public officer in a special and limited sense, is not a public officer in the ordinary sense, and by virtue of his office takes no official part in the government, the admission of women to the bar would not be a violation of our common law. If an attorney's occupation is a public office in the governmental sense, the admission of women will be illegal until the disability is removed by the legislature. The test cannot be found in anything so indeterminate as whatever concerns the administration of justice. Nothing concerns the administration of justice more than the part taken by men and women as witnesses in the trial of civil and criminal cases. Governmental power is not exercised by their testifying truly or falsely. Neither is it exercised by an attorney in advising a client, drawing a will, deed, declaration, or plea, questioning witnesses, or arguing upon their testimony. Before appearance by attorney was allowed by acts of parliament, a person appearing as attorney for a party under a royal mandate may have been regarded as invested with a degree of official authority.

After the passage of the Act of 1403 (4 Hen. IV. chap. 18), entitled "For Regulation of Attorneys," which required them "to be sworn well and truly to serve in their offices," there may have been little occasion to distinguish between their position as officers of the court and the position of other officials who exercised powers of government. Serjeants at law, appointed by the king, may have been considered officers in a peculiar sense. All barristers might be accounted officers by those who denied that they were agents of their clients. To what extent attorneys and counsel were understood to be government officers, and to what extent they were mere occupants of places assigned them in the social and legal ranks into which the whole community was divided, may be a question. 1 Bl. Com. 271, 272, 376, 396-408. Giving due weight to history, tradition, and usage, it does not appear that members of the New Hampshire bar are public officers in any other sense than that in which they are officers of the court. That sense is well understood, and is fully set forth and clearly defined in authorities before cited.

In determining whether an indictment shall be not prosequed or tried, the attorney general acts for the state in business in which he is the state's agent, exercises a portion of the power of the state, and performs an official duty. The prisoner's counsel is not employed by and does not act for the same principal, exercises no governmental power, and performs no official duty due from him to the state. As adviser, draughtsman, and counsel for other parties than the state, he is the private agent of his employers. His admission to practice was not an admission to the state's service in an official or unofficial capacity. When retained by the state to bring a civil suit or prosecute an indictment, he does not become a state officer. When not retained by the state, he is not in the state's employment; and his vocation as an attorney and an officer of the court (a public officer, in the special and limited sense explained by the authorities), with no power or duty of a governmental nature, is not a public office, within the meaning and reason of the common-law rule which excludes women from government by withholding electoral and official power. Their exclusion from the exercise of legislative, executive, and judicial authority does not prevent their being licensed to practice as physicians or attorneys.

When the attorney-general employs counsel in a state case (Gen. Laws, chap. 263, § 2), there is a distinction between the position of the public prosecutor, who acts in his official capacity, and the position of the attorney, who renders service in pursuance of a contract. In every branch of the government illegal attempts may be made, by contract or license, to delegate official power to disqualified persons, minors, women, and aliens, and to adult male citizens. State v. Hayes, 61 N. H. 323-329. The inconvenience that may arise from this practice, and the difficulty (in some cases) of finding the line between official and non-official employment, are not a ground on which the existence or the necessity of the line can be denied, or on which it can be held that a woman cannot legally act as an amanuensis in drawing an indictment, or as an attorney in a civil or criminal case.

When the petitioner furnishes the evidence required by the rules, the question of her admis- sion to examination (or admission to practice without examination, as a person who has been admitted and has practiced in another state) will be considered.

All concurred.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA SUPREME COURT, GENERAL TERM.

James L. BARBOUR, Appt.,

v.

Laurence HICKEY et al.

(.....D. C.....)

1. An unexplained delay of two years before filing a bill for specific performance of a contract to convey improved city property, upon which the price has not been paid, will defeat the relief sought.

3. The tender of the whole amount of purchase money before it was due, under a contract by which part was to be paid in interest bearing notes, is not a proper tender of performance of the contract.

3. A certified check is not properly tendered instead of money.

4. Specific performance cannot be ordered of a contract for the sale of land made by a man whose wife did not join in it, and who refused to execute the conveyance; nor can the husband alone be compelled to execute it, with a deduction from the purchase price of the value of her dower interest, as this changes the contract.

(January 11, 1894.)

NOTE.—Specific performance of contracts for conveyance where wife refuses to unite in the conveyance.

Specific performance against wife on contract of husband.

Specific performance of a contract by a husband in regard to the homestead will not be enforced as against the wife. Leonard v. Crane, 147 Ill. 52; Yost v. De Vault, 9 Iowa, 60; Conboy v. Kansas City & S. R. Co., 42 Kan. 658; Bird v. Logan, 35 Kan. 223.

So she will not be compelled to release dower in land where the husband has made a contract of sale. Hall v. Hall, 125 Ill. 96; Wiswall v. Hall, 3 Paige, 313, 3 L. ed. 168; Richmond v. Robinson, 12 Mich. 183; Kelsey v. Crowther, 7 Utah, 519; Buchoz v. Walker, 19 Mich. 224; Hanna v. Phillips, 1 Grant, Cas. 253; Schoonmaker v. Bonnie, 119 N. Y. 666, modifying 43 Hun, 634.

The same was stated in Kiddleberger v. Menzer, 7 Watts, 142, but was not the question involved.

These cases fully sustain the position in the main case of BARBOUR v. HICKEY.

And the wife will not be required to specifically perform a contract made by the husband in regard to executing a conveyance of her lands. Graybill v. Brugh, 21 L. R. A. 133, 89 Va. 895; Welsh v. Bayard, 21 N. J. Eq. 146; Wooden v. Morris, 3 N. J. Eq. 65; Hennessey v. Woolworth, 128 U. S. 435, 32 L. ed. 500; Williams v. Christie, 4 Duer, 29; Bryan v. Woolley, 1 Bro. P. C. 184; Daniel v. Adams, Amb. 493; Squire v. Harder, 1 Paige, 494, 2 L. ed. 728, 19 Am. Dec. 446; Rogers v. Brooks, 30 Ark. 612; Beaver v. Trittip, 24 Ind. 41.

So where a husband made an exchange of lands, but contracted that she should assume payments on that conveyed to her it would not be specifically enforced. Musgrove v. Hodges, 46 Kan. 764.

So where the husband made mutual partition, it would not be enforced as against the wife, but as she came into court and then consented a decree was ordered. Ireland v. Rittie, 1 Atk. 542.

See "Enforceable contracts," infra.

Specific performance against wife on contract of husband and wife.

And specific performance by wife will not be 24 L. R. A.

decreed on a contract by husband and wife to convey her property. Martin v. Mitchell, 2 Jac. & W. 425; Hogan v. Hogan, 89 Ill. 427; Spurck v. Crook, 19 Ill. 415; Butler v. Buckingham, 5 Day, 432, 5 Am. Dec. 174; Knowles v. McCamly, 10 Paige, 342, 4 L. ed. 1008; Starbuck v. Hynod, 1 Ohio L. Bull. 140.

So where the contract is to convey lands. Long v. Brown, 66 Ind. 160.

And in Gardner v. Moore, 75 Ala. 394, 51 Am. Rep. 454, it was stated that specific performance of a contract by a married woman's husband, to convey, would not be enforced where her power to convey is derived from the statute.

And a court of equity refused to enforce a contract by a husband and wife to levy a fine to the use of the purchaser, but decreed that the husband must refund the money. Otread v. Round, 4 Vin. Abr. 203.

So a deed incomplete from defective acknowledgment or want of delivery will not be enforced as a contract to convey. Jenkins v. Harrison, 66 Ala. 345; Martin v. Dwelly, 6 Wend. 9, 21 Am. Rep. 245; Carr v. Williams, 10 Ohio, 805, 36 Am. Dec. 87; Mittler v. Hine, 13 Ohio St. 665; Carney v. Hopple, 17 Ohio St. 38; Leland's App. 13 Pa. 84.

And in Moseby v. Parree, 5 Helsk. 26, it was stated that a married woman could not join with her husband in executing a penal bond that would be binding on her on her failure to execute a deed in fee simple with covenants of warranty.

See also "Enforceable contracts," infra.

Specific performance against wife on contract of wife.

A contract by a married woman for the conveyance of her real estate will not be specifically enforced against her, where it is not executed with all the requirements of a conveyance under the statute. Watrous v. Chalker, 7 Conn. 224; Jackson v. Torrence, 63 Cal. 521; Blythe v. Darkin, 68 Ala. 370; Pilcher v. Smith, 2 Head, 204; Avery v. Griffin, L. R. 6 Eq. 606; Steffey v. Steffey, 19 Md. 5; Ogleby Coal Co. v. Pasco, 79 Ill. 164; Jones v. Goff, 63 Tex. 248.

So a deed not executed according to the statute will not be specifically enforced as a contract to convey. Townesley v. Chapin, 12 Allen, 476; Moulton v. Hurd, 20 Ill. 137, 71 Am. Dec. 257.

So a contract by a wife to make a lease will not be specifically enforced. Aylett v. Ashton, 1 Myl. & C. 105, 5 L. J. Ch. N. S. 71.

And where a married woman made a mistake as

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Special Term sustaining a demurrer to and dismissing the bill in a suit brought to compel specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Carusi & Miller, for appellants:

The title being in equity vested by the agreement in complainant as assigns of Holmes, he has a right to have a decree compelling Laurence Hickey to convey the property to him, and if his wife will not join in the deed, the value of her inchoate dower right should be ascertained and deducted from the amount of purchase money.

Complainant shows his willingness to take the property and his ability to comply with the terms of sale, and asks that defendant Laurence Hickey convey the property to him, deducting from the purchase money the value of the inchoate dower of Mrs. Hickey.

Martin v. Merritt, 57 Ind. 84, 26 Am. Rep. 45; Wright v. Young, 6 Wis. 125, 60 Am. Dec. 455.

And in Dreutzer v. Lawrence, 56 Wis. 594, a contract by husband and wife for the sale of land owned jointly by them was specifically enforced against both, on the ground that under the statute which gives her full control of real estate which she owns in her own right, her contract in regard to such lands will be enforced as though she were unmarried.

As to how far courts will enforce contracts for conveyance against husbands where the wife refuses to join there is some conflict of decisions, some courts holding that a contract by a husband to convey the homestead will be specifically enforced.

Where the contract is unobjectionable (as to sale of real estate) it is as much a matter of course for a court of equity to decree specific performance, as it is for a court of law to give damages for a breach of it.

And the same was stated in Shaw v. Vincent, 64 N. C. 690, but held that such an equity could not be applied in a court of law.

Other courts hold that a decree will not be granted compelling the husband to convey subject to the right of his wife and deducting damages for her refusal to join in the deed, holding with the main case that this would be making a new contract. *McCann v. Alvey, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in this case, as assignee of a contract for the sale of certain real estate, situated in the city of Washington, has filed this bill against the defendants to procure a decree for specific performance of the contract. The contract is in writing, and bears date the 15th of September, 1888. By this contract the defendant, Laurence Hickey, agreed to sell the property to the defendant, James O. Holmes, and the latter, on the 17th of September, 1888, assigned the contract to the plaintiff. In fact, Holmes acted as the agent of the plaintiff in making the purchase, though the fact was not disclosed to the defendant Hickey until some time after the contract was made. The bill was filed on the 6th of December, 1890, against Hickey and his wife, though the wife was not a party to the contract. A decree is prayed against both husband and wife, that they be required to join in the execution of a deed for the property to the plaintiff. Holmes is also made a defendant to the bill. Hickey and wife severally demurred to the bill, and the demurrers were sustained and the bill dismissed. And in thus disposing of the case we think the court below has committed no error.

By the terms of the contract, the two lots, Nos. 16 and 17, in Square No. 536, were agreed to be sold by the defendant Laurence Hickey to Holmes for the sum of $5500, and the sum of $100 was paid at the time as part of the purchase money. The title to the property was to be perfect, or otherwise the $100 deposit was to be returned. It was also

And the same was held where the purchaser never believed that he could have purchased the fee. Castle v. Wilkinson, L. R. 5 Ch. 584, 39 L. J. Ch. 843, 18 Week. Rep. 586.

And so it is held that the purchaser can only require the vendor to convey without deducting damages for refusal of wife to unite. Dixon v. Rice, 16 Hun, 422; Flaharty v. Blake (N. J.) July 2, 1887; Bonnet v. Babbage, 19 N. Y. Supp. 984; Reilly v. Smith, 25 N. J. Eq. 158.

A husband will not be compelled to obtain his wife's signature to his conveyance. Weed v. Terry, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 344, 45 Am. Dec. 257; Martin v. Mitchell, 2 Jac. & W. 425; Howell v. George, 1 Madd. 13; Peeler v. Levy, 26 N. J. Eq. 330; Daniel v. Adams, Ambl. 495.

And in Frederick v. Coxwell, 3 Younge & J. 514; Fisher v. Worrall, 5 Watts & S. 478; and Weller v. Weyand, 2 Grant, Cas. 105,—it was stated that a vendor would not be required to procure his wife to join in his deed.

And in Davis v. Jones, 4 Bos. & P. 267, Lord Mansfield said: "Nothing can be more absurd than to allow a married woman to be compelled to levy a fine through the fear of her husband being sued and thrown into goal, when the general principle of law is that a married woman shall not be compelled to levy a fine."

Formerly it was held that the husband must procure his wife's joinder. Hall v. Hardy, 3 P. Wms. 186; Withers v. Pinchard, cited in 7 Ves. Jr. 475; Barrington v. Horn, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 17.

So in Berry v. Wade, Finch, 180, although counsel for plaintiff agreed that a plea that the wife was a joint owner and not a party to an award on a contract to exchange land, but the court ordered defendant to convey according to his agreement.

And in Stephenson v. Morris, 7 Ves. Jr. 474, the defendant was decreed to obtain his wife's joinder in a surrender of copyhold, but he did not allege inability to procure her joinder.

And while in Sedgwick v. Hargrave, 2 Ves. Sr. 57, it was said that the court will not make a personal decree on the wife where the husband and wife contract, yet the husband was decreed to convey and procure his wife's joinder or refund the money.

And in Hulmes v. Thorpe, 5 N. J. Eq. 415, it was stated that a wife would not be decreed to convey, but as she had twice acknowledged a deed she 24 L. R. A.

had shown such consent that she might be ordered to give a deed, but the safer way would be to order the delivery of the deed that had been already executed.

Mutuality; enforcing contracts against vendee.

It is generally held that where contracts are not enforceable by the vendee, on account of the wife of the vendor not being compelled to convey, the vendor cannot enforce specific performance of such contract. Watts v. Kinney, 3 Leigh, 272, 2 Am. Dec. 266; Williams v. Graves (Tex.) May 2, 1894; Shenandoah Valley R. Co. v. Dunlap, 88 Va. 348; Luse v. Deitz, 46 Iowa, 205; Chilhowie Iron Co. v. Gardiner, 79 Va. 305; Ten Eyck v. Manning (N. J.) Nov. 10, 1888; Harris v. Mott, 10 Beav. 169, 15 Jur. 978.

So where the married woman had refused for years to perform the contract for conveyance she and her husband cannot thereafter obtain a decree for specific performance. Holgate v. Eaton, 116 U. S. 33, 29 L. ed. 538.

And in Richards v. Doyle, 36 Ohio St. 41, 38 Am. Rep. 550, it was stated that such a contract as is not mutually enforceable will not be decreed to be specifically performed.

But where the contract is binding on the husband and wife it will be specifically enforced against the purchaser. Newberry v. Slaffer, 96 Mich. 468; Van Allen v. Humphrey, 15 Barb. 555.

And where the wife has fully performed her part and the purchaser is in possession, he cannot object to want of mutuality in a suit by the vendors for specific performance. Seager v. Burns, 4 Minn. 141.

And in Fennelly v. Anderson, 1 Ir. Ch. Rep. 706, it was held that a husband and wife may maintain a suit for specific performance of an agreement by them with a third party for the sale to him of lands of which the husband is seized in right of his wife.

This case admits that the law has changed in regard to the purchaser obtaining specific performance and that he could not, but bases the decision on statements made by counsel in arguments in other cases, and that pending this negotiation the married woman might have validated the contract by acknowledging it under Statute 4 & 5 Wm. IV. chap. 92, and refuses to dismiss the petition on the ground of want of mutuality.

Cases in regard to reformation of deeds have been omitted from this note. I. T.

agreed that the terms of sale should be complied with within twenty days from the date of the contract, and thereupon the property was to be deeded to Holmes or his assigns. Twenty-five hundred dollars of the purchase money were to be paid in cash, and the balance to be paid in three notes of $1000 each, bearing six per cent interest, payable in one, two, and three years from date respectively.

The plaintiff alleges in his bill that on the 5th day of October, 1888, after the contract had been assigned to him, and within the twenty days for the performance of the contract, he called on the defendant, Laurence Hickey, and tendered him in cash, in the form of a certified check by one of the banks of the City of Washington, $5,400, which, with the $100 paid at the date of the contract made the sum of $5,500, the full amount of the purchase money; and, at the same time, tendered the draft of a deed for the property in fee-simple, to be executed by said Hickey and his wife. But, as it is alleged, the defendant, Laurence Hickey, refused to accept the amount so tendered him, or to examine and execute the deed, on the ground, as stated by him, that his wife was not willing to sell and convey the property to the plaintiff, and, therefore she declined to become a party to the deed.

The plaintiff then alleges that he has always been ready and willing, and is still ready and willing, and tenders himself ready to perform the agreement on his part, upon having a conveyance made to him for the property in fee simple by Hickey and wife, discharged of any incumbrance thereon, and the dower right in the same, held by the wife; but that the defendant Laurence Hickey has refused, and does still refuse, to perform the agreement on his part, under pretence that he is unable to convey the property free of dower, for the reason alleged by him that his wife will not join him in the deed.

The bill then alleges that although the wife will not join her husband in the deed, yet the plaintiff is ready and willing to take a deed of conveyance in fee simple of the property from the husband alone, subject to the contingent right of dower in the wife, at the price stated in the agreement, less whatever may be the reasonable value of said contingent right of dower in the property. The plaintiff also claims to be reimbursed for expenditures made by him, in having the title to the property examined and the deed prepared.

The prayer of the bill is that the defendants Hickey and wife be compelled by a decree to execute, acknowledge, and deliver to the plaintiff a deed in due form of law, conveying the property free of all incumbrances, upon the plaintiff paying the purchase money mentioned in the contract. Or that a decree be passed requiring the defendant Hickey to convey to the plaintiff, subject to the contingent right of dower of the wife in the property, a good fee simple title, by a proper deed therefor, first deducting the value of such contingent right of dower of the wife in the property from the amount of purchase money stipulated to be paid. There is also a prayer for general relief.

34 L. K. A.

There are several grounds upon which the court below was well justified in sustaining the demurrers and dismissing the bill.

A party coming to a court of equity for specific performance must show that there is equity and good conscience in support of his claim to relief, and that his application is made within reasonable time, in view of all the circumstances of the case. In this case the bill was not filed until after the lapse of more than two years from the time the defendant Hickey refused to receive the money and execute the deed. This was undue delay under the circumstances of the case, and there is nothing shown in the bill to justify the delay. The lots of ground were improved by buildings thereon, and they require the expenditure of money to keep them in repairs, and to keep up insurance; and the salable value of the property was liable to constant change and fluctuation; and where the purchase money has not been paid, the motive for enforcing the contract or not enforcing it specifically may largely depend upon such change in value.

Apart, however, from the objection of delay in making the application, there was no proper tender of performance of the contract on the part of the plaintiff, such as was required by the terms of the contract itself. The tender of the whole amount of the purchase money within the twenty days was not what was contemplated by the contract. By the terms of the contract, the defendant Hickey was entitled to receive in cash $2,500 of the purchase money, and the balance in three notes, at one, two and three years, to bear interest at the rate of six per cent. This investment of a portion of the purchase money may have been a very material consideration with the defendant Hickey, inducing him to enter into the contract of sale. Clearly, the plaintiff had no right to require the defendant to forego his right to receive the notes, according to the terms of the agreement. Nor had the plaintiff a right to require the defendant to receive a certified check instead of money. Before the plaintiff could rightfully demand performance on the part of the defendant, he should have tendered strict performance on his own part.

But there is more substantial ground shown for sustaining the demurrers than those to which we have referred; and that is the want of right in the plaintiff to require the defendant Hickey to procure the joinder of his wife in the conveyance of the property, or to submit to a modification of the contract, and to have the contract specifically executed as modified. The question here presented is one that has been variously decided, both in England and in this country. Indeed, it has been a perplexing question to the court; but the great weight of authority of the present day would seem clearly to be against the attempt of a court of equity to compel a husband to procure the joinder of his wife in a conveyance with him, against her will, at the peril of his being imprisoned for contempt of court for nonexecution of the decree. For such a decree would seem clearly to contravene both the letter and the policy of the statute, which requires that, in order to give effect to a conveyance of the estate of the wife, or to bar her right of dower in the estate of her husband, she shall, apart from her husband, declare that she executes and acknowledges the deed willingly and freely. U. S. Rev. Stat. relating to District of Columbia, secs. 450, 451. But how is this to be accomplished if the wife is unwilling to execute the deed, or to make the acknowledgment required by the statute? The husband ought not to be put in a position by a court of equity to tempt him to coerce his wife to join him in a deed, nor ought the wife, especially where she is not a party to the contract, to be put to the alternative of either executing and acknowledging the deed, or of allowing her husband to be committed to prison for contempt of court because of the noncompliance with the decree for specific performance.

In the view of and according to the opinion of some of the ablest and most distinguished chancellors and writers on equity jurisprudence, a decree for specific performance against the husband in such case ought not to be made.

This was the opinion of Lord Chancellor Cowper, Lord Chancellor B. Gilbert, Lord Eldon and Sir Thomas Plumer, as shown by Chancellor Kent, in the second volume of his Commentaries, p. 169; and the learned American chancellor and commentator leaves no doubt of his own opinion upon the subject as being strongly opposed to decreeing specific performance in such cases.

In 2 Story on Equity Jurisprudence, §§ 781, 782, the subject is treated by the author with great clearness and force. After stating that there have been many cases in which agreements and covenants of this sort have been decreed to be specifically performed, the author proceeds to say that the reason for such decrees is said to be because, in such cases, it is to be presumed that the husband, when he enters into such a covenant, has first gained the wife's consent for that purpose. "But," continues the learned jurist, "this reason is a very insufficient one for so strong a doctrine; for it may be a presumption entirely against the fact; and, if correct at the time, the wife may have subsequently withdrawn her consent, and refused, upon very proper grounds, to comply with the covenant. Let us suppose a case in which, either there has been no consent, or it has been thus withdrawn; it may then be asked, and indeed, it has been asked, with the earnestness of great doubt, whether, if it is impossible for the husband to procure the concurrence of his wife in such a proceeding, a court of equity, acting according to conscience, will decree the husband to perform what it is morally impossible for him to perform? It seems difficult to maintain the affirmative especially as a full compensation may generally be obtained by returning the money with interest and damages. But there is a stronger ground, upon which the propriety of the doctrine may well be contested. It is the impolicy of endeavoring to compel the husband to use undue influence, and unjustifiable means, inconsistent with the harmony, peace, and confidence of conjugal life, to obtain such a surrender of the rights of the wife. It is offering to him a premium to be ungenerous, as well as unjust, and separating his interest, as well his good faith from hers."

It is insisted, however, that if the wife cannot be required to join with her husband in the making of the deed, a decree should be made against the husband, requiring him to convey, and that he should suffer an abatement of the purchase money to an amount equivalent to the value of the contingent right of dower of the wife in the property. But to do this would be simply modifying the contract, and decreeing its specific performance as modified. To ascertain the value of such contingent right of dower would necessarily involve a controverted question of fact—a question that would likely elicit a variety of opinion and judgment; and when determined it would not be the agreement of the parties but would be a distinct term introduced into the contract by the court. Such method of dealing with the contract is not consistent with the equitable doctrine of specific performance. The court should either execute the contract as made by the parties, or decline the exercise of the jurisdiction altogether. Upon this subject we refer to the opinion of Chief Justice Gibson, in the case of Clark v. Seirens, 7 Watts, 107, 83 Am. Dec. 745. The remedy at law is adequate, and the plaintiff must be remitted to that remedy if he desires redress.

It follows that the decree of the court below dismissing the bill must be affirmed, with costs to the appellees.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

James E. CHAMPER, Appt.,

v.

City of GREENCASTLE.

(...Ind....)

1. The reasonableness of an ordinance is open to judicial inquiry, when it is passed in the exercise of general authority to legislate on the subject without prescribing the mode of its exercise.

2. General power to license and regulate places for the sale of liquor does not prevent judicial inquiry as to the reasonableness of an ordinance prohibiting the use of blinds, screens, etc., in such places.

NOTE.—Municipal power to prohibit screens in bar-rooms.

CHAMPER v. GREENCASTLE appears to be the leading case upon this question.

In Shultz v. Cambridge, 88 Ohio St. 652, blinds, screens, curtains, shades, etc., were prohibited under power to regulate ale, beer, and porter houses or shops, and the question arose whether or not a

3. An ordinance prohibiting the use of screens, blinds, stained glass, etc., or anything that will obstruct the view of the interior of saloons is not authorized by a mere general authority to license and regulate saloons and is therefore invalid.

(October 31, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Putnam County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the penalty for the alleged violation of a city ordinance requiring the removal of screens from the front part of saloons. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. P. O. Colliver and C. C. Matson for appellant.

Mr. Thomas T. Moore, for appellee:

Many things are universally regarded and recognized as the proper subjects of police regulations; chief among which is the liquor business.

Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, p. 275; Schwuchow v. Chicago, 68 Ill. 444; Black, Intoxicating Liquors, p. 114, § 82; Re Wilson, 33 Minn. 145.

Laws in relation thereto are upheld by the courts as not infringing the constitutional rights of the individual, as the same are construed by the courts.

Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, p. 310; Schwuchow v. Chicago, supra; Black, Intoxicating Liquors, p. 114.

Even the total prohibition of the traffic in intoxicants is within the police power.

Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, p. 304, and note 1, and 307 note 1, 310, 311; Black, Intoxicating Liquors, pp. 48, 49, and notes, p. 113; Barlemeyer v. Iowa, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 129, 21 L. ed. 919.

It being then conceded that the state has the general constitutional power to regulate the traffic and can delegate the power to the municipality, it would seem that the only question that need seriously be argued in this case is the proposition "that such ordinance is unreasonable, and subversive of fundamental rights."

The power to regulate all places where intoxicating liquors are sold to be used in and upon the premises, has been conferred by the state upon municipal corporations.

This power to regulate is given in the broadest manner.

Appellant urges that the ordinance is invalid, because it is an unreasonable interference with the property rights of the citizen, and places a burden on the saloon keeper from which other property holders are exempt.

In State v. Lewis, 20 L. R. A. 52, 134 Ind. 250, it was held "that in matters over which the legislature may properly exercise police power, it has a right to do so, although in so doing it affects the property rights of the citizen."

No one possesses a natural inalienable or constitutional right to keep a saloon for the sale of intoxicating liquors.

When a municipal corporation is invested with the authority to license and regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors, it has the implied power to make all such ordinances as may be necessary to make the grant of power effective and accomplish the ends of municipal good order and public security intruded to its care.

board partition was within the meaning of the ordinance. It was held that it was not, and the court expressly refused to consider the question whether or not the ordinance was reasonable and consistent with the policy of the state.

CHAMPER V. GREENCASTLE was followed in a later Indiana case, Steffy v. Monroe City (Ind.) Nov. 3, 1893, in which the ordinance was passed by a town under the general grant of power to license, regulate, or restrain . . . the sale of spirituous, vinous, malt, or other intoxicating liquors. The court held that power was not given by such statute to prohibit the use of screens in windows and the general language of CHAMPER V. GREENCASTLE, as to the reasonableness of the ordinance was somewhat modified in that the court refused to place its ruling on the ground of the unreasonableness of the ordinance, but did place it on the fact that the ordinance was not authorized by the grant of power, and there is a strong intimation that that is the ground upon which CHAMPER V. GREENCASTLE was decided.

In Steffy v. Monroe City, supra, the court says that "the distinction between this case and those cases holding valid screen ordinances relating to times when it is not lawful to make sales is patent." There are statutes in several of the states which prohibit screens in saloons the whole or a portion of the time, which have been construed in several cases, but a careful search has failed to disclose any cases in which ordinances of that character have been construed, except those mentioned above.

H. F. F.

Ordinances will not be declared invalid or unreasonable or in restraint of trade, except in plain cases.

Mr. Tiedeman says on page 810 of his work on Limitations of Police Powers that it has been declared to be a reasonable exercise of the police power to prohibit the erection of screens and shutters where liquors are sold, and cites Com. v. Costello, 183 Mass. 192; Com. v. Casey, 184 Mass. 194; Shulte v. Cambridge, 88 Ohio St. 659; Com. v. Gibbons, 184 Mass. 197.

In Decker v. Sargeant, 125 Ind. 404, this court upheld an ordinance providing for the removal of screens and blinds at such times as the party was not permitted by law to sell intoxicants.

States have the constitutional power to enact laws prohibiting the use of screens by drinking saloons.

McCabe, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit by the appellee against the appellant, begun in the mayor's court of said city to recover the penalty provided for the violation of an ordinance of said city. Appellee recovered judgment, from which appellant appealed to the circuit court, where appellant's demurrer to the complaint for want of sufficient facts and his motion to dismiss the cause were both overruled, after which appellee again recovered judgment. Appellant assigns for error these rulings of the trial court, and that the complaint does not state facts sufficient. The whole question thus raised turns upon the validity of an ordinance of said city which reads as follows:

"An ordinance to provide for the removal of all saloon screens and window blinds, and providing penalty for the violation of such ordinance. Whereas it is claimed that there have been frequent violations of the liquor law in the city of Greencastle, Indiana, by the saloon keepers of said city in selling intoxicating liquors to minors and intoxicated persons, and also in allowing minors to congregate in such saloons around the pool table and billiard tables kept therein; and whereas it has been found difficult, if not impossible to obtain the evidence necessary to secure a conviction for such violations of law owing to the blinds and screens, erected and maintained by such saloon keepers to the doors and windows of such saloons so as to obscure and prevent a view of the interior thereof. Therefore, for the better policing of said city, and the more perfect enforcement of law, be it ordained by the common council of the city of Greencastle, Indiana, that it shall be and is hereby made unlawful for any person or persons who own, operate, or run any saloon, shop, or other place where intoxicating liquors are sold to be used in and upon the premises within said city of Greencastle, Indiana, or within two miles beyond the corporate limits of said city to put up, erect, or maintain any door, screens, window blinds, stained, ground, colored, or darkened glass of any kind to any of the doors, windows, or openings of such saloon, shop, or other place where intoxicating liquors are sold to be used in and upon the premises, or to put up, erect, or maintain any obstruction of any kind whatever to any of such doors, windows, or openings, that will in any way obscure or prevent a full view of the interior of such saloon, shop, or place aforesaid, but all such screens, blinds, and stained, ground, darkened, or colored glass, and all other obstructions aforesaid to the doors, windows, and openings of such saloons, shops, and places where intoxicating liquors are sold as aforesaid, shall be taken down and removed, so as to give a full and unobstructed view of the interior of such places at all times. Provided that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent said saloon keepers and persons aforesaid from having the usual and ordinary shutters to said doors. Any persons violating any of the provisions of this ordinance shall, upon conviction before the mayor of said city, be fined in any sum not less than ten dollars, nor more than one hundred dollars for each offense, and each day that such obstruction shall be put up, erected, maintained, or remain in place shall constitute a separate and distinct offense. This ordinance shall be in force and take effect from and after its passage and publication."

It is contended on behalf of the appellant that this ordinance is void because it is unreasonable, oppressive, and in violation of the constitution, because it invades the rights of private property.

The validity of the ordinance depends upon the answer to the question, Had the municipal corporation of Greencastle the power to pass the ordinance? Municipal corporations have such powers only as are conferred upon them by the act of the legislature creating them, and such incidental powers as are implied by their creation, and as are essential for the accomplishment of the purposes of their creation and for their continued existence. Lafayette v. Cox, 5 Ind. 88; Kyle v. Malin, 8 Ind. 84.

All acts of such corporations not strictly within these limits are void. Their acts cannot be declared void by the courts because of any supposed conflict between them and the constitution, so long as their acts are authorized by the legislature and the act of the legislature is not in conflict with the constitution. It is well settled that the creation of a municipal corporation carries with it the implication that such corporation is empowered to pass such ordinances and by-laws as may be needful for its well being. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 815, 816, and authorities there cited.

It is also well settled law that where an ordinance is passed by such municipality under no other authority than such implied power, the ordinance to be valid must be reasonable, and if it is unreasonable it will be void. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 819, and authorities cited.

The first question therefore that confronts us is whether the passage of the ordinance was a reasonable exercise of the power conferred upon the corporation, and therefore whether the corporation had the power to pass it or not. It is to be regretted that counsel on neither side have furnished us with such a discussion of the question as its great importance seems to demand, as it is one of first impression in this court therefore we have gone far beyond the briefs in our investigation in order to reach a correct solution of the question. At the threshold of this discussion we are met with the suggestion that this court has held in two cases that no inquiry can be made into the reasonableness of the ordinance when the legislature has enacted anything upon the subject, and hence, it is suggested in such a case has delegated to cities the power to exercise a discretion in such matters, and therefore, in such case, the courts cannot review that discretion. The first of the cases referred to is Coal-Float v. Jeffersonville, 112 Ind. 15, where it was said: "The power of a court to declare an ordinance unreasonable, and therefore void, is practically restricted to cases in which the legislature has enacted nothing on the subject of the ordinance, and, consequently, to cases in which the ordinance was passed under the supposed incidental power of the corporation merely," and refers to sections 819 and 828 of 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed., as authority for that statement. If the quotation is to be construed as meaning that no inquiry in such a case can be made into the question whether the ordinance was a reasonable exercise of the power conferred, then the language is too broad; if, however, it is to be construed to mean that no inquiry can be made as to whether the ordinance is reasonable or not, where the power to pass it has been conferred, then it is correct. We think the latter is the proper construction to be placed on the language employed.

Section 828 of Dillon, supra, is the one that relates more directly to the point involved in the above quotation. It reads as follows: "Where the legislature in terms confers upon a municipal corporation the power to pass ordinances of a specified and defined character, if the power thus delegated be not in conflict with the constitution, an ordinance passed pursuant thereto cannot be impeached as invalid because it would have been regarded as unreasonable if it had been passed under the incidental power of the corporation, or under a grant of power general in its nature. In other words, what the legislature distinctly says may be done cannot be set aside by the courts because they may deem it to be unreasonable or against sound policy. But where the power to legislate on a given subject is conferred, and the mode of its exercise is not prescribed, then the ordinance passed in pursuance thereof must be a reasonable exercise of the power, or it will be pronounced invalid." This is undoubtedly a correct statement of the law, and is amply supported by the adjudicated cases wherever the point has come in question. It affords support to the statement of the rule by the learned judge who wrote the opinion from which we have quoted above, only when construed as we have indicated. That was a case in which a recovery in attachment was sought against the boat for wharfage due the city of Jeffersonville. The question arose on the sufficiency of the complaint which set out the ordinance, which provided that "all steamboats, barges, keel boats, flat boats, or boats or rafts, coming to or landing at the wharves of said city shall pay to said city, to wit: . . . "For every coal float used, etc., $200 per year, payable, etc." The statute authorizing the enactment of the ordinance is the 84th subdivision of section 8106, Rev. Stat. 1881, which confers on cities the power "to establish and construct wharves, docks, piers and basins, and to regulate landing places, and to fix the rates of landing, wharfage, and dockage on all public grounds belonging to such city," etc. This court held in that case, and we think correctly under the statute above quoted, that "cities are expressly authorized . . . to fix rates of wharfage and dockage," and therefore expressly authorized to pass the ordinance above set out. And hence no question of the reasonableness of the ordinance could arise in that case, because the legislature had conferred the authority on the city to pass an ordinance of that specified and defined character, and the section of Dillon cited as above set out, and authorities there cited, as well as the facts, fully warranted the conclusion reached in that case, but neither the case then before the court, nor the authority cited warranted the statement of the abstract proposition quoted, unless construed as we have indicated above. The same question incidentally arose on an appeal to this court from a judgment for a personal injury through negligence of appellant in Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Harrington, 181 Ind. 426, where the language above quoted from the Coal-Float Case is again quoted. The question there incidentally arose as to the validity of an ordinance limiting the speed of engines and trains within the corporate limits of the city of Indianapolis. This court held that the legislature had expressly conferred the power on the city to pass such an ordinance. Therefore, when this court reached the conclusion which it correctly did in that case, that because the legislature had conferred the power to pass the ordinance of the specified and defined character mentioned, it had decided all there was touching that point in the case, and the quotation from the Coal-Float Case was unnecessary to the decision, though the enunciation was correct in both of the cases, with the construction we have placed upon it. Bills v. Goehen, 117 Ind. 221, 8 L. R. A. 261, involved the validity of an ordinance requiring, among other things, a license for a roller skating rink, which provided that the same should be granted upon the payment of such sum as the mayor and common council should determine in each particular case. The 14th subdivision of section 8108, Rev. Stat. 1881, empowered cities "to regulate and restrain all tables, alleys, machines, devices or places of any kind for sports or games kept for hire or pay, if deemed expedient, without a license, . . . to be provided for by ordinance." This court held the ordinance invalid, because it placed the power to determine the amount of the license fee in each particular case in the mayor and common council, instead of fixing the same in the ordinance. This was tantamount to holding that the ordinance was not a reasonable exercise of the power conferred by the statute. First Nat. Bank of Mt. Vernon v. Sarile, 129 Ind. 201, 18 L. R. A. 481, involved the validity of an ordinance making it "unlawful for any person to alter, repair, or rebuild any frame or wooden building within the limits described, when the cost shall equal or exceed three hundred dollars."

After recognizing the principle that cities in this state have ample power to enact and enforce reasonable ordinances in the absence of express statutory authority to secure protection against fire, the statute was referred to as conferring additional power, which authorizes cities, "to organize a board of public improvements, and empower such board to grant permits to build houses or additions thereto; to prevent the erection of wooden buildings in such parts of the city as the common council may determine." As applied to repairs, it was held that the ordinance was invalid because the statute did not empower cities to prevent the repair of wooden buildings in all cases. This is not at variance with the broad language used in the Coal-Float Case, supra, construed as we have indicated. We briefly quote from some of the cases cited in support of the text of section 819 of Dillon, cited as authority in the Coal-Float Case, supra. In Haynes v. Cape May, 50 N. J. L. 55, it is said: "There are circumstances under which the court will inquire into the reasonableness of ordinances passed by a municipal body under legislative powers granted to it. Those circumstances exist when the powers granted by the legislature are expressed in terms general and indefinite. But where the legislature has defined the delegated powers and prescribed with precision the penalties that may be imposed, an ordinance within the powers granted, prescribing a penalty within the designated limit, cannot be set aside as unreasonable."

And in another one of those cases it was said: "But the legislature has granted ample power of legislation upon the subject of the erection and use of steam engines within the city limits to the mayor and city council of Baltimore, independent of the power 'to prevent and remove nuisances.' They are clothed with power to pass ordinances 'for the prevention and extinguishment of fires,' for 'securing persons and property from danger or destruction,' etc., . . . It has been well said in reference to such general grants of power that as to the degree of necessity for municipal legislation on the subjects thus committed to their charge, the mayor and the city council are the exclusive judges, while the selection of the means and manner (contributory to the end) of exercising the powers which they may deem requisite to the accomplishment of the objects of which they are made the guardians, is committed to their sound discretion. . . . This discretion is very broad, but is not absolute and in all cases beyond judicial control. . . . And while we hold that this power of control by the courts is one to be most cautiously exercised, we are yet of opinion there may be a case in which an ordinance passed under grants of power like those we have cited is so clearly unreasonable, so arbitrary, oppressive, or partial, as to raise the presumption that the legislature never intended to confer the power to pass it, and to justify the courts in interfering and setting it aside as a plain abuse of authority." Baltimore v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217, 38 Am. Rep. 229.

In another of those cases it is said: "It is contended by the appellees that the town did not have the power to pass the ordinance. It is provided by statute that cities and towns have the power 'to establish and regulate markets, to provide for the measuring or weighing of hay, coal, or any other article for sale.' . . . This statute expressly confers on cities and towns the power to provide for the measuring or weighing of hay, coal, or any other article. The manner in which the power conferred shall be exercised is left to the discretion of the corporation, subject, however, to the general rule that the ordinance must be reasonable." Davis v. Anita, 78 Iowa, 325.

To the same effect is Meyers v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 57 Iowa, 555, 43 Am. Rep. 50, also cited in Dillon. And in another of those cases, the supreme court of California said: "On this subject the rule is this: where the legislature in terms confers upon a municipal corporation the power to pass ordinances of a specified and defined character, if the power thus delegated be not in conflict with the constitution, an ordinance passed pursuant thereto cannot be impeached as invalid because it would have been regarded as unreasonable if it had been passed under the incidental powers of the corporation, or under a grant of power, general in its nature. In other words, what the legislature distinctly says may be done cannot be set aside by the courts because they may deem it unreasonable or against sound policy. But where the power to legislate on a given subject is conferred, and the mode of its exercise is not prescribed, then the ordinance passed in pursuance thereof must be a reasonable exercise of the power or it will be pronounced invalid." Ex parte Chin Yan, 60 Cal. 78.

To the same effect is Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 606, 28 Am. Rep. 642, and many other cases cited in support of the text of Dillon, supra, and elsewhere too numerous even to cite, and we have been unable to find any case to the contrary, unless the two cases first above referred to in this court are to be so regarded. But as we have already intimated, we do not think they are to be regarded as against the current of authority, when the language employed in them is construed as we have done, and the cases were both correctly decided on the facts.

But before we can consider the question whether the ordinance here involved is a rea-reasonable exercise of the powers vested in the corporation, we must inquire what the nature and extent of the powers are that have been conferred by the legislature of this state upon municipal corporations. Because, if the legislature has conferred the power to pass ordinances of the specified and defined character of the one here in question, according to the principles we have laid down above, then no inquiry can be made as to the reasonableness of the ordinance. In that event, we would be limited in our investigation to the single question whether the act of the legislature conferring the power was valid and constitutional, or not. The adjudicated cases cited by the appellee's counsel in support of the validity of the ordinance here in question, were cases where the municipalities had been empowered by the legislature of the state of Massachusetts to pass the particular and specified ordinances prohibiting the use of screens in saloons. No power has been conferred by the legislature of this state on municipal corporations to pass ordinances of that particular character, that is, no statute has specified ordinances to prevent the use of screens by saloons as among those that cities are empowered to pass. Hence, the cases cited by appellee's counsel are not only not in point here, but their influence is against appellee's contention, if they are entitled to any weight at all, because the enactment of such a statute in Massachusetts is a tacit recognition by the lawmaking power of that state that municipal corporations there had no power to pass ordinances of that kind without a statute specifically authorizing the same. The statute upon which the claim is based in this case that the corporation had the power to pass the ordinance here in question, empowered cities "to regulate and license all inns, taverns, or other places used or kept for public entertainment; also, all shops or other places kept for the sale of liquors to be used in and upon the premises. (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 8106, subdiv. 13) . . . "And to regulate all places where intoxicating liquors are sold to be used on the premises." Rev. Stat. 1881, § 8154, and the general welfare clause.

It would be difficult to perceive of a more general grant of power, the two subdivisions of the sections referred to are almost as general and indefinite as the general welfare clause. The power to legislate upon a given subject is conferred upon municipal corporations, but the mode of its exercise is not prescribed, and the kind of ordinances that they are empowered to pass are not specified or defined. The legislature has not said here what distinct or particular acts may be done by the corporation. It has not said that municipal corporations may pass ordinances of the kind here involved. If it had, that would end the inquiry. As it has not, by the uniform current of authority, ordinances passed under such a general grant of power must be reasonable, consonant with the general powers and purposes of the corporation, and not inconsistent with the laws or policy of the state, otherwise it is the duty of the courts to declare them void. We therefore hold that the ordinance here involved is open to the inquiry whether its passage is a reasonable exercise of the power conferred by the legislature. It is strenuously insisted that the corporation by the police power, is authorized to pass the ordinance in question, whether it is reasonable or unreasonable. The police power of the state, so far, has not received a full and complete definition. It may be said, however, to be the right of the state or state functionary to prescribe regulations for the good order, peace, health, protection, comfort, convenience and morals of the community, which do not encroach on a like power vested in congress by the Federal Constitution, or which do not violate any of the provisions of the organic law. Of this power it may be said that it is known when and where it begins, but not when and where it terminates. But this power, whatever may be its limits, resides in the state in its sovereign capacity, and can only be possessed and exercised by a municipal corporation by a delegation thereof to the municipality by the law making power of the state. Crawfordsville v. Braden, 180 Ind. 149; 15 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 1166, 1167, and authorities there cited.

So that at last the validity of the ordinance depends upon whether it is a reasonable exercise of the power conferred or not. It forbids the erection or maintenance of door screens, window blinds, stained, ground, colored or darkened glass to the doors, windows, or openings of any saloon, shop, or other place where intoxicating liquors are sold to be used on the premises, or the erection and maintenance of any obstruction of any kind whatever of such doors, windows, or openings that will obscure or prevent a full view of the interior of such saloon, etc., provided that it is not to be so constructed as to prevent such saloon keepers and other persons mentioned from having the usual and ordinary shutters to their doors. Under this ordinance if valid, it would make the use of the ordinary door screen or window shutters, window screens and window curtains to the doors or windows of a saloon unlawful, and it would likewise make it unlawful to maintain stained, ground, colored or darkened glass of any kind to any of such doors or windows. We know of our own knowledge, common alike to all, that the use of door screens, window screens, window shutters, window curtains and blinds, ground, darkened and colored glass used in and to doors and windows are among the comforts and conveniences of civilized life. They are used in other business houses than saloons, in private residences, in public buildings and offices, in hotels and dining halls, in depots, in court houses and in churches. Indeed, it may be said that they are necessary comforts and conveniences of civilized life, almost as much so as houses are to live in, and to do business in. The protection of the occupants of such houses against the fierce rays of the sun in the proper use of such houses and places may be almost, if not quite, as necessary as protection against the storm and the rain and the inclemency of the weather generally. It may be admitted that the evils arising from the sale of intoxicants have been so great that it has become the settled policy of the state from the earliest times to place and keep the traffic under stringent restrictions, by the statutes of the state, and that these evils are often increased by violations of these statutory restrictions by licensed dealers. But we cannot concur in the contention of the appellee's counsel that the saloon "business is an illegitimate one and that in order to make large profits therein it is necessary to constantly violate the law." The business is one that any one could lawfully engage in, in the absence of any statute on the subject, and the statutes of the state which from time to time have imposed restrictions and burdens upon the traffic do not proceed upon the idea that the business is illegitimate, and seek to legalize an illegitimate business, but proceed upon the idea that the business is legitimate, and owing to the evils arising from it seek to place it under restrictions and burdens so as to lessen those evils. Be this as it may, there is no reason in saying that because some saloon keepers violate the law, all shall be deprived of the use of the necessary comforts and conveniences of civilized life in their business. If the corporation can make it unlawful for them to use screens to exclude flies and insects, they may make it unlawful for them to use shutters to their doors to exclude the cold, the storm and the rain, if it can make it unlawful for them to use window shutters and window blinds and curtains, colored, stained and ground glass in doors and windows of their saloons under the pretense of permitting an unobstructed view into the interior of their saloons the better to detect violations of the liquor law, then there is no reason why they cannot be compelled to make the whole front of their saloons of solid glass without any wood or any other material. Indeed, if the corporation has the power to make the ordinance here in question, for the reasons given in the preamble thereto, then it necessarily has the power by ordinance to compel them to open the whole front of their saloons from one side to the other, without even the poor privilege of putting solid glass in as a protection against storm, rain, and the inclemency of the weather, and against theft and robbery. This court in Dicker v. Sargeant, 125 Ind. 404, in holding an ordinance valid forbidding the use of screens by saloon keepers between eleven o'clock in the evening and five o'clock in the morning, recognized the principle that such an ordinance might not be valid when applied to that portion of the day when the saloon keeper was authorized to sell under his license. There can be no doubt that such an ordinance would be within the power granted, and reasonable, if it is confined in its operation to such time as the saloon keeper is not allowed to do business, as between eleven o'clock at night and five o'clock in the morning, on Sundays and legal holidays, and other days on which they are prohibited from doing business.

We are of opinion that the ordinance here involved goes beyond any power conferred upon the common council either by express statute or by necessary implication, and is therefore void. The circuit court erred in overruling the demurrer in the complaint.

The judgment is reversed, the cause remanded, with instructions to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

Petition for rehearing overruled June 8, 1894.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT

Ex parte J. D. SIKES.

(.....Ala.....)

1. Municipal authority "to license and regulate" the sale of intoxicating liquors does not include the authority to prohibit it absolutely.
2. The only qualification of power contained in a grant to a municipality of the power "to fix the price of licenses" is that it shall not be prohibitory.
3. A license fee of $2,000 is not invalid as prohibitory, or as a license for revenue as distinguished from a license tax for police purposes, where the agreed facts show that there is a population of 4,000 inhabitants and the retail sales of the business for four years aggregate $351,000, while two thirds of the entire expense required to police the city are traceable solely to the sale of liquor within its corporate limits.

had been refused by the probate judge for Pike County to obtain the release of petitioner from custody to which he had been committed for refusal to pay a fine for violation of a municipal ordinance prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor without a license. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hubbard, Wilkerson & Hubbard and Worthy & Foster for petitioner.
Mr. William L. Parks for respondent.

Coleman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By an ordinance of the city of Troy, dealers in spirituous liquors were required to pay $2,000 for a license. For a violation of this ordinance, the defendant was arrested and fined, and, refusing to pay the fine, imprisoned. He sued out a writ of habeas corpus before the probate judge, who, upon the hearing of the case, refused to discharge the petitioner, and remanded him to the custody of the marshal. From this judgment the petitioner prosecutes his application to this court. All the facts are agreed upon, and the only question is as to the legality of the ordinance. The prisoner contends that it is prohibitory in its character and effect, and that such an ordinance is not authorized by the municipal charter of the city of Troy. The Act of the Legislature of 1890-91 (page 724) declares that "the mayor and councilmen shall have power and authority . . . to license and regulate the retailing and the wholesale of liquors within the corporate limits, and to provide for the annulling and revoking such license for good cause being shown; . . . to license and regulate commission merchants, dry goods and grocery merchants, keepers of hotels and eating houses; . . . to prohibit the sale of liquors on any election day; . . . to restrain and prohibit gambling; to prohibit all unlawful assemblies; to prohibit violations of the Sabbath; to prevent stock from running at large; . . . to prohibit all breaches of the peace; . . . and to fix the price or tax on all licenses." We think it very clear that the authority "to license and regulate" a business does not include the authority to prohibit it absolutely. We have so held many times. Ex parte Burnett, 80 Ala. 461; Miller v. Jones, 80 Ala. 89; Ex parte Covert, 92 Ala. 94; Ex parte Anniston, 90 Ala. 516. Independent of the judicial construction given to a statute which merely confers the power to license and regulate a business, a reading of the act in question clearly demonstrates that the intention of the legislature to authorize the mayor and councilmen to "license and regulate," and not to "restrain and prohibit," the sale of spirituous liquors. Whenever it was intended to confer such power, the words used are "restrain," "prohibit," but these and similar words are not used when the power in regard to the sale of liquors was conferred. We are of opinion the legislature has the constitutional right to prohibit or to authorize any community or municipality absolutely to prohibit the sale of spirituous liquors. Marion v. Chandler, 6 Ala. 899; Ex parte Burnett, and Ex parte Covert, supra; Harris v. Livingston, 28 Ala. 579.

Having the power to prohibit, the legislature undoubtedly could fix the price of a license to sell liquor at any sum, and, had it seen proper to exercise the right, could have conferred on the mayor and councilmen of Troy, by express provision, the power either to prohibit entirely, or fix the price of the license at $2,000. It has, however, declared that the "mayor and councilmen shall have the power to license and regulate the retailing and the wholesale of liquors within the corporate limits," and "to fix the price or tax on all licenses." The only limitation on the power and discretion of the mayor and councilmen in fixing the "price of the license" is contained in the words "license and regulate the sale," and that this limitation is that the price fixed shall not be prohibitory. What is the test by which it shall be determined whether a "price for a license" is or is not prohibitory? Upon what principle is it to be held that a price of $200 is not prohibitory, and $2,000 is prohibitory? What rules and facts must guide the mayor and councilmen in fixing the price of a license, so that the ordinance will be an exercise of power within their granted authority "to fix the price," and not transgress the boundary fixed by the term "to license and regulate," so that it shall not be prohibitory? No one unvarying price will suit for all places and all circumstances. It seems to us the populousness of the municipality, the profitability of the business, the character of the business proposed to be licensed, and its effects upon the community, the additional expense necessarily entailed by a police supervision of the business, and perhaps other matters might be mentioned, are all proper subjects of inquiry in arriving at a legal and just conclusion in fixing a price which will not be prohibitory. In the case of Ex parte Burnett the town council of Cahaba required, by ordinance, a license of $1,000, and it was pronounced prohibitory in its character. There were no facts in evidence in the case except the ordinance, and the act of the legislature granting charter rights, and the conviction of the petitioner for a violation of the ordinance; and in that case it was said: "Neither is it our purpose to limit the price of a corporation license to the sum fixed by the general law on a license to retail. As one of the incidental powers of a corporation, the council may certainly transcend that limit, provided their ordinance is not in its nature prohibitory." (We italicize.) The authority granted to the mayor and councilmen of Troy is more specific and enlarged than that under which the town council of Cahaba acted. In the case of Ex parte Marshall, 64 Ala. 266, the rule was recognized that the "license may be graduated by the populousness of the community in which the privilege was to be exercised, and the profitability of the employment;" and in Van Hook's Case, 70 Ala. 361, the additional expense for a faithful enforcement of police superintendence should be considered.

Under these rules and principles of law, we cannot say the ordinance is void upon its face. What are the agreed facts? The city of Troy has a population of about 4,000 inhabitants. That in the years 1890, 1891, 1892, and 1893, there were three separate retail liquor dealers in Troy, who paid a license of $2,000; and each did a business of about $38,000 in the year 1890, and the business of each in 1891 amounted to $35,000, and in the year 1892 to about $24,000, and in the year 1893 each did a business of $20,000—an aggregate for the four years of $351,000. The capital invested upon which this business was transacted is not stated, but it is stated "that the profits on the amount of business were about one fourth of these amounts, out of which were paid all licenses, besides house rent, clerk hire, and other current expenses." It is also stated that the expenses of petitioner Sikes for the year 1893 approximated $6,000. What these expenses were for, whether confined solely to the business of selling liquor, or whether family expenses were included, is not stated, and the expenses of the two other dealers are not given. It is also stated that "the other dealers, for the year 1893, did an unprofitable business after paying their licenses and other expenses." It also appears that the other two dealers have paid the license for the year 1894, and are continuing in the business. The profits at 25 per cent on total sales of spirituous liquors in Troy for four years, not exclusive of current expenses, were about $88,000. We do not think there is anything in this showing which reasonably satisfies the mind that the license required is prohibitory in a business view. Again, it is agreed in the statement of facts that there is an average of "seven hundred and fifty violations of the city ordinances during each year, and that two thirds of them are the results of whiskey sold in Troy." It is further agreed that the present necessary expenses of the city for a marshal and police force exceed $3,100, "and, if there were no saloons and no sale of whiskey in Troy, this expense could be reduced to $1,000." Confessedly, then, two thirds of all the violations of the ordinances of the city, and two thirds of the entire expense required to police the city, are traceable solely to the sale of liquor within its corporate limits. Certainly, municipal officers charged with the "protection of the lives, health, and property of the citizens, the maintenance of good order and quiet of the community, and the preservation of the public morals," and to this end intrusted with the police power, are justified in the exercise of all the authority granted when they undertake to regulate business productive of such results. It is contended that, as the sale of liquor increases the violation of the city ordinances, the revenues of the city are proportionately increased; and this, it is said, must be considered in estimating the evil results of the traffic, and the extra expenses of policing the city. The peace of a community, the quiet and happiness of the family, the influence of example upon the young and old, the public morals, have no money value. The argument leads to the conclusion that, however much a business may increase violations of the law, if the revenue therefrom is proportionately increased, the less it is to be condemned as an evil. We need say no more on this point.

It is further argued that the amount required for a license shows that the purpose was to raise a revenue for the city, and not for police purposes. It is manifest that, if the purpose of the ordinance was to raise revenue, then it was not intended to be prohibitory. A business which is prohibited cannot yield a revenue from licenses. We do not think there is any foundation for the argument, and the facts of the case, without repeating them, justify this conclusion. Doubtless, in providing for the necessary expenses of the city, and in fixing the assessments of taxes upon the property, the income anticipated from licenses, as well as fines, entered into the computations; but this alone would not determine that the licenses were for revenue, as distinguished from a license tax for police purposes. There are some dicta in our own court, and declarations of principle by high authority, not altogether in harmony with all that we may have said; but our construction of the act of the legislature conferring municipal power upon the mayor and councilmen of the city of Troy is that there is a full grant of power "to fix the price of licenses," limited only, by the grant to "license and regulate the sale of liquor;" and the only qualification of power contained in this grant, construed in connection with the unqualified power "to fix the price of licenses," is that it shall not be prohibitory. In our opinion, the facts of the case show that the ordinance is within the power granted. This was the conclusion reached by the trial judge, and, in our opinion, it was correct. Petition denied.

J. Warren BROWN et al.

1. A court of equity has no power to interpose its authority for the purpose of adjusting controversies that have arisen among the shareholders or directors of a corporation relative to the proper mode of conducting the corporate business.
2. A stockholder in a corporation cannot successfully invoke the power of a chancery court to control its officers or board of managers, or to wrest the corporate property from their charge through the agency of a receiver, so long as they neither do nor threaten to do any fraudulent or ultra vires acts, and so long as they keep within the limits of by-laws which have been prescribed for their governance.

The invalidity of a resolution passed at its domicile by a foreign corporation to wind up its affairs will not entitle the courts of a foreign state, in which it is doing business, to decree its dissolution and appoint a receiver, if its directors have submitted to the jurisdiction so that relief may be afforded by simply enjoining the execution of the resolution.

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Colorado in favor of plaintiffs in a proceeding brought to procure the dissolution of the defendant corporation and the appointment of a receiver for an alleged illegal attempt at dissolution. Reversed.

Statement by Thayer, District Judge:

This was a bill filed by the appellees against the Republican Mountain Silver Mines, Limited, and its directors, and also against Edward F. Tremayne, its secretary, who had been appointed liquidator to wind up the affairs of the corporation. The bill averred, in substance, that the defendant company was a corporation organized and existing under the laws of Great Britain, with its principal office in the city of London, England, but that its mining property, consisting of numerous mining lodes or claims, was all situated in the state of Colorado; that the capital stock of the company consisted of 100,000 deferred shares and 50,000 ordinary shares of the nominal value of one pound each, and that the great majority of said shares were owned by the appellees, and by other American shareholders, not named as complainants, but in whose behalf the bill purported to have been filed; that within the eight years preceding the filing of the bill the defendant company had remitted from England less than $18,000 for the working of its mines; that prior to December, 1889, it had become indebted to a bank in the state of Colorado for money borrowed to conduct certain mining operations, and that on the 11th of December, 1889, the bank had recovered a judgment therefor in the sum of $4,858 and costs, which judgment was subsequently assigned to A. P. Welch, who was chairman of the company's board of directors, he having advanced the money wherewith to pay said judgment; that in the year 1890 the defendant company, in pursuance of a resolution of its board of directors, had executed two deeds of trust on all of its mining property in Colorado for the purpose of securing two notes which had been drawn in favor of said A. P. Welch; and that under the terms of said deeds of trust the property covered thereby might be sold on thirty days' notice if the sum due on said notes was not paid at maturity. The bill averred that said deeds of trust in favor of said Welch were executed without authority, for the purpose of acquiring title to the property of the company, in fraud of the rights of the majority of the shareholders; but it did not appear from any other allegations of the bill, or from the testimony produced at the trial, in what respect the deeds of trust were unauthorized, or that the indebtedness thereby secured was not justly due and owing to the party in whose favor they were ordered to be executed. The bill further averred, in substance, that on the 16th day of June, 1891, an extraordinary meeting of the shareholders was held in London, England, in pursuance of a notice theretofore given, for the purpose of appointing a liquidator under English laws to wind up the affairs of the corporation, but that the notice of such meeting was not sent to or received by the appellees and other American shareholders in time to attend the same. That at such meeting a resolution was passed that the company be wound up. That Edward F. Tremayne, who is named as defendant, be appointed liquidator of the company; and that he be vested with authority to sell the property and business thereof to any other corporation, and to receive in payment therefor shares in such other corporation, for the purpose of making a distribution of the same among the shareholders of the defendant company. That after the passage of such resolution a subsequent extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders was appointed to be held on July 1, 1891, at London, England, for the purpose of confirming, according to English laws, the resolution that had been adopted at the prior meeting of June 16, 1891. That only 16 days' notice was given of such confirmatory meeting of July 1, 1891, which was insufficient to enable the appellees, or any of the American stockholders, to be present, whereas a by-law of the defendant company expressly required that no such confirmatory meeting should be held to approve a resolution for the winding up of the company, within less than thirty days after the first meeting at which such resolution should be proposed and adopted. That at such second meeting, held on July 1, 1891, as well as at the prior meeting, none of the American shareholders were in fact present or were represented, but that the resolution of June 16, 1891, was nevertheless re-enacted and confirmed. The bill further charged that the adoption of said resolution under the circumstances aforesaid was in violation of the by-laws of the company, and was also a violation of English laws, but that, whether or not such action was within the letter of any English statute it was nevertheless fraudulent, because the several meetings had been held with knowledge that the American shareholders, who held a large majority of the stock, could not attend or be represented. The bill also charged that the liquidator appointed by the company to wind up its affairs was financially irresponsible, and that one of the appellees (J. Warren Brown) claimed to be a creditor as well as a stockholder of the defendant company, and that his claim was then in litigation. The testimony showed that the litigation had resulted in a final judgment in favor of the company. In view of the premises, the complainants below prayed that the members of the board of directors who had been made parties, and said Edward F. Tremayne, might be severally enjoined from selling or disposing of any of the defendant company's property; that said Tremayne might be restrained from taking any proceedings whatever as liquidator to wind up the affairs of the company; that a receiver might be appointed to take charge of all of the company's property in Colorado, and that he be authorized to sell and dispose of the same to the end that the defendant company might be dissolved and wound up for the benefit of all of its stockholders and creditors. On final hearing the circuit court sustained the bill, and granted substantially all of the relief that was prayed for therein. From such decree granting an injunction and appointing a receiver with a view of dissolving and winding up the company the defendants below have prosecuted an appeal to this court.

Argued before Caldwell and Sanborn, Circuit Judges, and Thayer, District Judge.

Mr. Charles E. Gast, for appellants:

In the absence of fraud, the court will not inquire whether the property has been well or ill managed.

Hedges v. Paquett, 8 Or. 77.

The case presented by this record relates wholly to the internal affairs of a British corporation, and as the complainants sue only as stockholders, upon a charge that their rights as stockholders have been ignored, this court has not, or rather will not entertain, a jurisdiction to settle the dispute.

French v. Gifford, 80 Iowa, 148; Strong v. McCagg, 55 Wis. 624.

Messrs. R. S. Morrison and Willard Teller, for appellees.

Thayer, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

It is made apparent by an inspection of the bill of complaint that it states no case entitling the complainants to any form of equitable relief, unless the right thereto can be maintained on the strength of the allegation that the shareholders' extraordinary general meeting of July 1, 1891, was an unauthorized meeting, because it was convened and held on insufficient notice under the charter and by-laws of the company. Unless that averment is sustained, we are unable to see that the complainants had any fair pretense for invoking the aid of a court of chancery to restrain the proceedings that were about to be taken by the English liquidator, in conformity with English laws, for the purpose of disposing of the property of the company, and winding up its affairs.

The corporation owed its existence to the laws of Great Britain. It held all of its property and franchises under and subject to the laws of that kingdom relative to the "incorporation, regulation, and winding up of trading companies and other associations," 24 L. R. A.

to which class of corporations it evidently belonged. Those laws entered into and formed a part of the defendant company's charter; and every shareholder not only had notice thereof and assented thereto when he became a member of the company, but he impliedly agreed that the company might be wound up in accordance with the provisions of such statutes, if it was thought proper to go into liquidation, and if a resolution to that effect was duly enacted. These principles must be regarded as sufficiently established by the decision in Relfe v. Rundie, 103 U. S. 222, 226, 26 L. ed. 337, 339. See also Canada Southern R. Co. v. Gebhard, 109 U. S. 527, 27 L. ed. 1020.

The jurisdiction that a court of equity may lawfully exercise over the affairs of an ordinary business corporation, in the absence of any statute conferring extraordinary powers, is likewise well defined. A court of chancery may, at the instance of a stockholder, and if the company itself refuses to move, lawfully entertain a bill to depose or to restrain the officers or directors of a corporation, when it appears that in their capacity as agents or trustees of the stockholders they have committed, or are about to commit, acts that are tantamount to a breach of trust, whether such acts consist of fraudulent dealings with the corporate property or funds, or whether they consist in engaging the corporation in enterprises that are beyond the scope of its chartered powers. In more general phrase, it is sometimes said that a court of chancery may grant equitable relief against a corporation, at the suit of an individual, "whenever a sufficient case for relief is shown upon ordinary principles of equity jurisprudence." Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 1042, and citations; Dodge v. Woolsey, 59 U. S. 18 How. 331, 341, 15 L. ed. 401, 404; Zabriskie v. Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. 64 U. S. 23 How. 381, 385, 386, 16 L. ed. 488; Peabody v. Flint, 6 Allen, 52; March v. Eastern R. Co. 40 N. H. 548, 77 Am. Dec. 732; Robinson v. Smith, 3 Paige, 232, 8 L. ed. 126, 24 Am. Dec. 212.

But a court of equity has no power to interpose its authority for the purpose of adjusting controversies that have arisen among the shareholders or directors of a corporation relative to the proper mode of conducting the corporate business, as it may do in case of a similar controversy arising between the members of an ordinary partnership. Corporations are in a certain sense legislative bodies. They have a legislative power when the directors or shareholders are duly convened that is fully adequate to settle all questions affecting their business interests or policy, and they should be left to dispose of all questions of that nature without applying to the courts for relief. A stockholder in a corporation cannot successfully invoke the power of a chancery court to control its officers or board of managers, or to wrest the corporate property from their charge through the agency of a receiver, so long as they neither do not threaten to do any fraudulent or ultra vires acts, and so long as they keep within the limits of by-laws which have been prescribed for their governance. If in either of the cases last specified a stockholder is nevertheless dissatisfied with the business policy that is being pursued, or the methods of corporate management, he must seek redress within the corporation, in the mode prescribed by its charter and by-laws, rather than by an appeal to the courts. Hawes v. Oakland, 104 U. S. 450, 26 L. ed. 837; Oglesby v. Attrill, 105 U. S. 605, 610, 26 L. ed. 1186, 1188; French v. Gifford, 80 Iowa, 148; Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare, 461. Moreover, the doctrine is very well established that a court of equity has no power at the suit of an individual to decree the dissolution of a domestic corporation, and a winding up of its affairs, unless such extraordinary power has been conferred upon it by the terms of some statute. The better view undoubtedly is that at common law no such power to decree a surrender or forfeiture of corporate franchises was vested in courts of equity, to be exercised at the suit of an individual, although some courts have upheld the right of a court of chancery to exercise that power when invoked by the state through its attorney-general. Folger v. Columbian Ins. Co. 99 Mass. 267, 274, 96 Am. Dec. 747; Stee v. Bloom, 5 Johns. Ch. 866, 877, 1 L. ed. 1111, 1115; French v. Gifford, supra; Atty. Gen. v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 85 Wis. 425, 511; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 1040.

It is hardly necessary to remark that if courts of equity, at the suit of a shareholder, and in the absence of a statute, have no jurisdiction to dissolve a domestic corporation, and to wind up its affairs, much less can they exercise such powers with respect to a foreign corporation. It has, indeed, been held on much consideration that the courts of a state have no visitatorial powers over foreign corporations doing business within the state, unless such power is expressly conferred by local statutes; and for that reason it was ruled by the supreme court of Maryland that it would not entertain a proceeding by a citizen of Maryland, who was a shareholder in a foreign company, to compel it to annul an alleged wrongful forfeiture of his stock, and to reinstate him as a stockholder. North State Copper & Gold Min. Co. v. Field, 64 Md. 151. See also Wilkins v. Thorne, 60 Md. 258.

In view of the foregoing principles, it is evident, we think, that the decree of the circuit court was erroneous in so far as it contained provisions which contemplated a sale of all of the defendant company's property in the state of Colorado, and a general liquidation of its affairs. As we have already shown, the circuit court had no inherent power, as a court of equity, to dissolve the company, and to wind up its business operations. It had no authority to enter a decree of that nature under any existing statute of the state of Colorado to which our attention has been directed, and it can hardly be pretended that it derived or could derive any such power or jurisdiction from the act of parliament under which the corporation was organized. The trial court appears to have been of the opinion that the resolution to wind up the company which was adopted at the meeting of June 16, 1891, and was confirmed at the meeting of July 1, 1891, was void, for the reason that the latter meeting was held on insufficient notice; but, if we accept that view as sound, it is nevertheless apparent that there was no occasion for the appointment of a receiver to hold and dispose of the company's property, or for the order directing him to inquire and to report in what manner the property in question could be most advantageously sold. As all of the defendants, including the foreign liquidator, had joined in an answer to the bill, and had thereby submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of the court, we think that adequate relief would have been afforded for the injury complained of,—if the trial court had simply declared the invalidity of the resolution to wind up the company, and had thereupon enjoined the defendants from taking any action to carry the same into effect. An injunction in the form last suggested would have been all-sufficient to prevent the threatened wrong, even if the resolution to wind up the company was in fact void; and we are unable to see that the record discloses any fact or circumstance which rendered an order for the appointment of a receiver and for the sale of the company's property either a necessary or a proper order.

It is insisted, however, that the resolution to wind up the company was neither void nor irregular, but was passed in strict conformity with English laws; and this contention on the part of the appellants compels us to make a brief reference to the company's articles of association, and to some provisions of the act of parliament under which the defendant company was organized. It is not denied that the act of parliament last referred to permitted the defendant company to go into voluntary liquidation in the manner contemplated by the resolution adopted at the shareholders' meeting of June 16, 1891, which was subsequently confirmed. The act of parliament provides that a company organized under the act may be wound up "when-ever the company has passed a special resolution requiring the company to be wound up voluntarily;" it further provides, in substance, that the liquidator appointed by the shareholders to wind up the company may be authorized to transfer the business and property of the company to another company, and in payment therefor receive shares in such other company for distribution among the shareholders of the company whose affairs are being liquidated. Vide Companies Act 1862, §§ 129, 161. The act defines a special resolution to wind up a company to be, in substance, one which has first been passed at a general meeting of shareholders, and has been confirmed at a subsequent general meeting, "of which notice has been duly given and held at an interval of not less than fourteen days nor more than one month from the date of the meeting at which such resolution was first passed." Vide Id. § 51. The resolution over which the controversy arises in the present case appears to have been passed and to have been subsequently confirmed in strict conformity with the provisions of the companies act above cited, both as respects the method of calling the meetings at which the resolution was proposed and adopted and as respects the notice given to shareholders of said meetings and the time within which they were to be held. It is contended, however, that although the second meeting was held within the period prescribed by section 51 of the Companies Act, to which we have alluded,—that is to say, not less than fourteen days nor more than one month from the date of the first meeting,—yet that it was not held within the period prescribed by section 186 of the defendant company's articles of association. An obvious answer to this contention is, that if the articles of association are in conflict with the act of parliament under which the company was organized, the act of parliament must prevail. Section 186 of the articles of association provides, in substance, that the company "may amalgamate its business with, or transfer its business and property to, any similar undertaking or company, or purchase or acquire the business or property of any company . . . carrying on a business similar to that of the defendant company, upon such terms as may be agreed upon, . . . and may pay for any business so acquired either in cash or in shares," etc., provided a resolution to that effect is passed by a three-fourths vote at an extraordinary general meeting, and is confirmed at a second meeting, held "not less than one month nor more than three months thereafter." It is obvious that if section 51 of the Companies Act and section 186 of the Articles of Association relate to the same kind of a proceeding or transaction, they are in conflict, because they prescribe a different period within which the confirmatory meeting must be held, and the companies act in that event must prevail. We think, however, that they relate to entirely different transactions. The companies act has reference to a proceeding to wind up a corporation whereby the corporation disposes of all of its property, surrenders its franchises to the crown, and thereby ceases to exist as a legal entity. On the other hand, the articles of association have reference to a proceeding whereby a corporation merely becomes consolidated with some other company doing a similar business, or purchases the property or business of some other company, in which case it neither surrenders its franchise nor ceases to exist. Under the provision contained in the company's articles of association it was intended no doubt that it might unite its business with that of any other company or firm that was engaged in similar enterprises by a simple agreement with such other company that had first been confirmed by the defendant company's members; but in a proceeding taken under the companies act to wind up a corporation it is necessary to appoint a liquidator to dispose of its property, and to effect a valid surrender of its corporate franchises. In view of what has already been said on this branch of the case, the necessary conclusion is that the meeting of July 1, 1891, was properly convened and held under the terms of the statute under which the defendant company was organized, and the resolution passed at such meeting was neither void nor irregular by reason of any provision found in the defendant company's articles of association.

We have not overlooked the charge contained in the bill that the two meetings held in London were intentionally called by the English shareholders on short notice for the express purpose of preventing the American shareholders from taking part in such meetings. With reference to that charge, and without deciding whether it is true or false, it is sufficient to say that the company's articles of association gave all foreign shareholders the right to name an address at any place in the United Kingdom, to which notices of all meetings were required to be sent, and the right to appoint an agent at such place to represent their interest at any meeting or meetings that might be held. Furthermore, the foreign shareholders were bound to take notice of the law under which the company was organized, and of the various provisions to which we have already referred that enabled the company to be wound up on short notice by a resolution passed at a shareholders' meeting and confirmed at a subsequent meeting. It is furthermore disclosed by the record that the English and American shareholders had been pulling at cross purposes for some years prior to June, 1891, and that the controversy between them was largely due to the fact that the English shareholders had contributed practically all of the funds to prosecute the business of the company while the American shareholders possessed the superior voting power. But, aside from these considerations, we think that a court of equity should not interfere merely on account of the motives that may have inspired the conduct of the English shareholders, so long as the action taken by them was strictly in accordance with English laws, and was not in violation of any provision of the company's charter or by-laws. Oglesby v. Attrill, 105 U. S. 605, 26 L. ed. 1186.

The result is that we have been constrained to disapprove of all of the provisions of the decree from which the present appeal was taken.

The decree of the Circuit Court is accordingly reversed, and the case is remanded to that court with directions to discharge the receiver, and to vacate its former decree, and to enter an order dismissing the bill of complaint at the complainants' costs.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Francis M. BROOKE et al.

v.

City of PHILADELPHIA et al.

(162 Pa. 123.)

1. A continuation of indebtedness not exceeding 7 per cent of the assessed valuation of a city by creating new indebtedness as fast as the old debts are paid is authorized by the Pennsylvania Constitution, art. 9, § 8, declaring that the debt of any city shall never exceed 7 per cent of the assessed value of the property therein.
2. Certificates of indebtedness of a city purchased and placed uncanceled in a sinking fund of a city, even if the city continues to pay interest on them, do not constitute a part of the indebtedness of the city within the meaning of a constitutional restriction of the amount of its indebtedness.
3. A loan of the city's credit to a corporation is not made by a contract between a city and a railroad company by which one half of the expense of abolishing grade crossings in the city is to be reimbursed to the city by the railroad company.

BILL by certain taxpayers of the City of Philadelphia to enjoin defendants from borrowing money and issuing certificates of indebtedness therefor for the purpose of assisting in elevating the tracks of a certain railroad company through a portion of the city. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Mayer Sulzberger, for plaintiffs:

The policy of the constitution of the state of New York differs from the policy of the constitution of Pennsylvania in this, that the object of the New York constitution is to limit the amount of municipal debt merely. The object of the constitution of Pennsylvania is to limit the amount of municipal debt pending its final extinction by sinking fund. The New York constitution provides for no sinking fund except for temporary loans; whereas the Pennsylvania constitution does not allow the temporary loans permitted by the New York constitution, and insists on the sinking fund, which it invests with inviolable sanctity.

For this reason the word "indebtedness" in the New York constitution received an interpretation in Bank for Savings in New York v. Grace, 103 N. Y. 313, which is inapplicable to the word "debt" in ours.

Messrs. James Alcorn and Charles F. Warwick, for defendant:

The city loan in the sinking fund does not form a part of the city debt, and was not intended by the constitutional provision to be counted in estimating the debt of the city.

The principle contended for was determined by Judge Pearson in Com. v. Reading, 15 W. N. C. 529.

NOTE—As to what constitutes an "indebtedness" within restrictive provisions upon the power of municipalities to contract indebtedness, see Beard v. Hopkinsville (Ky.) 23 L. R. A. 402, and note. 24 L. R. A.

See also 31 L. R. A. 794.

A case exactly similar to the present one was decided in the New York court of appeals on April 30, 1886, in the case of the Bank for Savings in New York v. Grace, 102 N. Y. 313.

The court of appeals, reversing the court of common pleas of the county of New York, held that the city stock of the city of New York held by the commissioners of the sinking fund was not an indebtedness of the city within the meaning of the constitution, but that the indebtedness referred to was one to be met in the future by taxation, and only such indebtedness as the municipality could be called upon to pay.

It cannot be successfully argued that if the defendants' view prevails there is any impairment of the obligation of the contract made by the city with the bondholders. They are not interested in the city debt purchased by the sinking fund; they are only interested in the appropriations being made to the sinking fund as provided by law and ordinances. The contract with them is that a sinking fund will be established and certain appropriations made to it annually. That contract is complete when the sinking fund uses the money appropriated to it in the purchase of the bonds.

All the complaints made by bondholders have been against the diversion of the sinking fund, and not against its use in the redemption of the debt.

Terry v. Wisconsin Marine & P. Ins. Co. Bank, 18 Wis. 87; Board of Liquidators of City Debt v. Municipality No. 1, 6 La. Ann. 21.

Pa. Const., art. 9, § 7, was intended to prevent the union of public or private capital or credit in any enterprise whatever, and to prevent a business partnership between a municipality and individuals or private corporations or associations. It did not prevent, as in Speer v. Blairsville School Directors, 50 Pa. 150, the legislature from authorizing the appropriation of money for the payment of bounties. The same view was taken by this court in Hilbish v. Catherman, 64 Pa. 154.

In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 47 Pa. 189, an ordinance authorizing the retention of a part of the dividends due to the city on stock of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company for the purpose of aiding in the establishment of an ocean steamship company, was held to be in violation of the Constitutional Amendment of 1857. So in Wilkesbarre City Hospital v. Luzerne County, 84 Pa. 55, the Act of May 21, 1874, enabling a private incorporated hospital to make requisitions upon the county for the payment of its charges for the support of patients under its treatment, was held to be an appropriation of money by the county to a corporation, and prohibited by section 7, article 9, of the Constitution.

In Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 388, a loan for the benefit of the gas works of the city of Philadelphia was not considered a violation of this provision of the Constitution.

Dean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As the contention here affects large public interests, an early final determination of it ought to be had; therefore, at the request of both parties, we have taken original jurisdiction of plaintiffs' bill. The plaintiffs are citizens and taxpayers of Philadelphia. They aver that the city councils, by ordinance approved March 15, 1894, authorized the creation of a city loan of $6,000,000, for the purpose of ridding the city of steam railroad grade crossings on twenty-four public streets from Broad to Thirtieth, all crossings of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad. The power of the city to make such a municipal improvement is not questioned, nor is its power, within certain constitutional limits, to create a debt, by loan or otherwise, to accomplish the purpose, denied. It is averred, however, that the debt of $6,000,000 authorized by this ordinance, when added to the existing debt of the city, will largely exceed the constitutional limits of municipal indebtedness, and is therefore illegal. It is further averred that the ordinance authorizing said loan discloses the fact that the money in part is to be expended in an improvement for the advantage of the railroad company, which company is by contract to reimburse the city in an amount equal to one half the expenditure, or $3,000,000; that, to this extent, it is a loan of the city's credit to a corporation; and the creation of the additional debt for that reason is, under the constitution, unlawful. The city denies that, if $6,000,000 be added to its existing actual debt, that debt will exceed the amount authorized by the constitution. It further denies that its contract with the railroad company is, in any correct ascertainment of the meaning of the constitution, a loan of its credit to the corporation. Section 8, article 9, of the Constitution declares that "the debt of any city shall never exceed seven per cent of the assessed value of the property therein, nor shall any such municipality incur any new debt or increase its indebtedness to an amount exceeding two per centum upon such assessed valuation of property without the assent of the electors thereof at a public election, in such manner as shall be provided by law; but any city, the debt of which now exceeds seven per centum of such assessed valuation, may be authorized by law to increase the same three per centum, in the aggregate, at any one time upon such valuation." This follows immediately after section 7 of the same article, which section prohibits the legislature from authorizing any municipality becoming a stockholder in any corporation, or loaning its credit or money to any corporation, association, or individual.

There were no such restrictions on legislative authority or on municipal power in the Constitution of 1838; and while not a few profound lawyers, because of the sparseness of restrictions in that constitution, and the multiplicity of them in our present one, think the old superior to the new, we doubt if any one condemns the policy disclosed in sections 7 and 8 of article 9, regulating and limiting municipal debts. The twenty years preceding the adoption of the Constitution of 1874 was an era of great growth and expansion in easy and rapid modes of communication and transportation; highways, such as railroads, plank roads, and turnpikes, were multiplied. Almost every municipal organization sought to promote the construction of them to, from, and through the municipal limits. They subscribed for the securities of these corporations, sometimes beyond their ability, and generally beyond their subsequent willingness to pay. Not seldom the courts were impelled, at the suit of importunate creditors to enforce the assessment and collection of taxes for payment of such debts by the imprisonment of municipal officers. Litigation, too, in more than one case demonstrated that increased ability to pay was not followed by increased willingness to pay such debts. The debt of one county in this commonwealth, for the larger part made up of subscriptions to the stock and bonds of railroad corporations, reached nearly 40 per cent of its assessed valuation. The basis of such debts was almost wholly speculative, for, when contracted, there was no traffic and no experience in the new enterprise which demonstrated any value to its securities. Prompted often by the wildest hopes of future municipal wealth and prosperity on the completion of the new highway, the county, city, or borough rushed into indebtedness to promote it. This propensity was characterized by an eminent writer on municipal law (Judge Dillon) as "an epidemic insanity, inducing extravagant corporate subscriptions to public works." The result of this insanity is shown by the fact that in 1860 the fourteen principal cities of the United States had an aggregate indebtedness of only $109,808,409 fifteen years afterwards, the aggregate debt of the same cities was $407,218,351. The debt had increased 271 per cent, the population, only 70 per cent. To this sort of debt there was added, during the war, large loans for bounty purposes, so that in 1878, when the constitutional convention was in session, if there was one evil more prominent and exasperating than another to the taxpayer, it was the big debt of his particular locality,—a debt often out of all proportion to its ability to pay. The convention struck at this evil when they framed sections 7 and 8 of article 9 of the Constitution. The people of the commonwealth struck at it when, by a large majority, they adopted the constitution. They fixed what they deemed the reasonable limit of municipal debt at 7 per cent of the assessed valuation. But we do not concur with the learned counsel for plaintiffs, in his most able argument, that the real intent and policy of the Constitution of 1874 was to establish or promote, except debt for temporary purposes, absolute nonindebtedness for cities, counties, and boroughs,—to inaugurate a new and "pay as you go" system. If his assumption be correct, there would seem to be no escape from his conclusion, viz., that no new debt ought to be incurred while any part of the old remains unpaid. But, it seems to us, the obvious intention of sections 7 and 8 of article 9, and section 8 of article 15, is to authorize a continuous debt, not exceeding 7 per cent of the assessed valuation. In these sections the constitution plainly says to all the municipalities of the commonwealth: "You may owe seven per cent of what you are worth; if you want to spend more than this, then you must pay as you go, for you shall not at any one time, in the aggregate, be in debt beyond this amount." As to the commonwealth itself, the intention was to wipe out the existing debt and thereafter permit the incurring of only a limited amount of debt on grave exigencies, and that only temporarily. But as to the municipal subdivisions of the state, the necessity of a reasonable debt for municipal improvements was recognized; the constitution sought only to limit the aggregate amount of it at any one time, and to provide for the gradual payment of any such debt incurred for any particular purpose within a period of thirty years. On this theory, the borrowing power within the 7 per cent limit would practically never be wholly exhausted, for, whenever the debt to this amount was created, the process of extinction would commence, leaving in a short time a margin for further loans. The constitution did fix, somewhat arbitrarily, perhaps, but nevertheless fixed, the limit of indebtedness at a sum which the people thought a reasonable indebtedness. They determined that no municipality thereafter should create a debt which practically bankrupted it, or a debt which imposed on the taxpayer a burden too grievous to be borne.

The contention here, then, turns on what is the present actual debt of the city. The amount of uncanceled, undestroyed evidences of debt, it is not disputed, is $52,758,845.22; the assessed valuation of the taxable property of the city is $769,930,542. Seven per cent of this amount would leave only a margin of about $1,000,000 more than the amount of uncanceled evidences of debt. If this evidence of debt which once existed still constitutes part of the real debt of the city, the $6,000,000 loan is in violation of section 8, article 9, of the Constitution. It is averred by defendants that these uncanceled certificates are not conclusive of the real debt of the city; that it is actually much less; that, of the $52,758,845.22 apparent debt, $23,130,100, made up of 6, 4, and 3 per cent loans of the city, is in the sinking fund, purchased by the city's money. Deducting this amount from the apparent debt leaves only $29,628,745 as the real debt, but little more than 4 per cent of the assessed valuation, and, adding the proposed loan to this, the whole real debt would not exceed 5 per cent of the assessed valuation. A debt is defined by lexicographers to be "that which one person is bound to pay to or perform for another." Are the city securities in the sinking fund still a debt owing by the city, and which she is still bound to pay? Bouvier defines a sinking fund as "a fund arising from particular taxes, imposts, or duties, which is appropriated towards the payment of the interest due on a public loan, and for the gradual payment of the principal." The mere definition of the term, however, helps but little in the determination of the meaning of the word "debt" in the constitution; for, whatever technical definition be given the name applied to the fund, the status of the obligations in it must be determined by the legislation, state and municipal, which put them there.

The first appearance of city legislation on the subject is an ordinance of March 12, 1807, Allison & Penrose's Philadelphia, p. 121. It is entitled "An ordinance for the reduction and payment of the debt of the city." It provides that $5,000 shall be set aside annually as a sinking fund, to be applied to the purchase and redemption of the funded debt of the city at its market price, not exceeding par, until the debt should be redeemed. If the securities could not be purchased at par, then the city treasurer was authorized to purchase for the fund 6 per cent bonds of the United States. Many ordinances were adopted in subsequent years having reference to the same subject, and disclosing the same purpose in substantially the same language. Then, in 1854, came the consolidation act, which provided "that the net debt of the county of Philadelphia, after deducting and canceling that portion in the sinking fund" (Laws 1854, § 88, p. 41), and the net debts of the several districts and municipalities incorporated with the city, after deducting and canceling the portions held by their respective sinking funds, should be consolidated into one debt, to be called the "debt of the city of Philadelphia;" further, that there should be annually raised by tax, in addition to the income from corporate property, a sum sufficient to pay the interest on the consolidated debt. It was further enacted: "No debt shall be incurred or loans made by the said city, without a contemporaneous appropriation of a sufficient annual income or tax, exclusive of loans, to pay the interest and sink the principal of such debt in thirty years." The consolidation act, in declaring what shall be called the "debt of the city of Philadelphia," says that that portion of the debt in the sinking fund shall first be deducted in an ascertainment of the amount of the debt. It recognized the certificates in the fund as still existing, but not existing as part of the consolidated debt. This was supplemented by a number of ordinances in the years following consolidation, all in harmony with the act, and intended to raise annually a sum sufficient to pay the interest and sink the principal of the funded debt in thirty years. The Act of 1857 prohibited the use of the investments in the sinking fund for any other purpose than sale for money or exchange for city loans, and directed that, when sold or exchanged, "the proceeds should be applied exclusively to the sinking fund or to the extinguishment of the funded debt." Then came section 3, article 15, of the Constitution of 1874, which directs that "every city shall create a sinking fund which shall be inviolably pledged for the payment of the public debt." "Every city shall create a sinking fund;" that is, there shall be set apart from all other city money for a specific purpose—the redemption or payment of the funded debt—a portion of the annual revenues of the city. Then, when this portion of the revenue reaches the fund, it is inviolably pledged for the payment of the funded debt. No temptation, however great, no necessity, however imperious, shall move the city to divert one dollar of the fund to a purpose other than the redemption or payment of the debt. The word "pledged" is to have in its connection here, not a technical legal definition, but its obvious meaning, that of a solemn promise, which, under no possible circumstances, shall be violated. The Acts of 1874 and 1879 regulating the incurring of municipal debts, and the funding of the same, direct the annual levy and collection of a tax sufficient to pay, in addition to the interest, the principal of the debt in thirty years. So far, then, as relates to the general public, among whom are these plaintiffs, what is called the sinking fund is the mere conduit through and by which the money raised by annual taxation reaches its destination. It goes into the fund for a specific purpose, to which it is inviolably pledged. When there, the commissioners must see to it that it accomplishes its purpose,—the payment of the funded debt of the city. When, with that end in view, they from time to time purchase any portion of the funded debt of the city, then the inviolable pledge of the fund, to the extent of the purchase, is kept; that much of the sinking fund has been, in fact, applied in payment of the funded debt.

As set out in appendix to plaintiffs' paper book, there are now in the sinking fund: 6 per cents, city loan, $14,233,350; 4 per cents, $1,940,750; 3 per cents, $6,947,000—altogether, $23,120,100 of city certificates purchased by the commissioners. There are, besides these, other securities, not those of the city in the fund. As to these last, obviously they remain in the fund, bound by the inviolable pledge which attached to them when they first became part of it. So far as concerns them, they have not yet been applied in payment or redemption of any part of the funded debt. An asset of the city, easily convertible into cash, they undoubtedly are, but as yet they have not operated to the reduction of the funded debt, to which purpose they were pledged. In effect, they only represent the savings of the city, set aside in anticipation of payment of the debt. As to any actual reduction of the debt by them, there has been none. The debt is still an outstanding liability, unaffected by the savings, with only an increased ability on part of the city to pay, an increase in ability measured by the cash value of the savings. When used in purchase of the debt, there is a release of the pledge and a discharge of the obligation to the amount of the purchase. It is not important, in determining the actual debt, that the commissioners have not authority, immediately on purchase, to cancel or destroy the city certificate; it is paid for by the money of the obligor, put into the fund for that very purpose. As an outstanding unpaid obligation, it can, as to the obligor, have no real effective existence after it is purchased and paid for with the city's money; and although the city, in this issue, only claims to deduct from the apparent debt the amount of 6 per cent certificates in the sinking fund, every city certificate in that fund representing a part of the funded debt, and purchased by the commissioners in the redemption or payment of that debt, ceases to be longer a part of the actual debt of the city. That much of the debt the city is no longer bound to pay, because practically it is paid. We are speaking now of the actual obligation of the city as affected by these certificates in the fund, but not yet canceled. If payments be not made into the fund for the redemption or purchase of the funded debt, as required by law, the commissioners must see to it that such payments are made, even to the institution of legal proceedings to compel annual payment by the city. The commissioners, in our view of their duty, are not, as has been suggested in the argument, mere city clerks or bookkeepers; they are invested with high powers involving very weighty responsibilities. All the legislation, both state and municipal, to which we have referred, is saturated with the one idea that the sinking fund is a plan or scheme by and through which the funded debt of the city shall annually be reduced by redemption or payment of the evidences of the debt outstanding,—that is, the certificates. If, then, the commissioners purchase for the fund any portion of the city loans, and they are no longer, as affects the city, a liability, are the certificates so purchased, even though not canceled, to be treated as an actual existing debt of the city? As between the city and its creditor, who has parted with his money on the apparent promise of an ordinance that these purchased certificates should not be canceled, but should remain in the fund until the maturity of the loan, he has the right to insist on the letter of his contract, whether there be any substantial benefit to him therefrom or not. He is entitled to his right under his contract, without impairment in a particular which he deems important. If he relied on a form, without substance, when he loaned his money, it is not for the city, which promised him not to cancel before maturity, to question his right or violate its promise by canceling as soon as paid. But the contention between the creditor and the city as to when the certificates may be lawfully canceled or destroyed is a wholly different one from that before us. Suppose, as is argued, another creditor loaned his money on the express stipulation of the ordinance that this purchased certificate should not be canceled until the maturity of the loan of which it was a part. Very well; let this be so. At most, this second creditor has two securities instead of one for his debt,—the one in his pocket, the other, uncanceled, in the sinking fund. But that adds nothing to the real debt. If a creditor have twenty securities of his debtor for $1,000 loan, the debtor's liability is determined, not by the aggregate of securities, but by the amount he actually owes, which is $1,000, not $20,000.

The city owes now just what it is bound to pay; not one cent more. If it has, through the sinking fund, purchased its own certificates, placed them uncanceled in the fund, and even pays interest on them annually, it cannot pay them again. The payment of annual interest is only a method or device for the annual appropriation to the fund. To illustrate further: Suppose the city were to resolve to lay a tax sufficient to pay its whole funded debt this year: what sum should it raise? If it assumed, as averred by plaintiffs is the fact, that its real debt is $52,758,845.22, which includes the city certificates in the sinking fund, it would then collect from the people $23,180,100 more than it would pay out. Uncanceled certificates to this amount, it is true, are in the sinking fund, but they have been already bought by the city's money under the sinking fund plan for the payment of the funded debt, and belong to the city. Manifestly, she would have raised $23,180,100 more than her debt,—more than she was "bound to pay or perform," under the definition of "debt" already quoted; but if a tax of 5 per cent would raise enough money to pay every debt she is bound to pay, as is not disputed, then her debt is 2 per cent within the constitutional limit. While this question is here raised for the first time in this state under the Constitution of 1874, a case almost the same was decided by the New York court of appeals. Bank for Savings in New York v. Grace, 102 N. Y. 818. Section 11, article 8, of the Constitution of that state has this provision: "No county containing a city of over one hundred thousand inhabitants, or any such city, shall be allowed to become indebted for any purpose, or in any manner, to an amount which, including existing indebtedness, shall exceed ten per centum of the assessed valuation of the real estate of such city or county subject to taxation." In 1886, the date of the suit, the authorized funded debt of the city and county of New York was $126,000,000; the assessed value of real estate was $1,168,448,137. The debt was therefore apparently in excess of the constitutional limit. But more than $34,000,000 of the city certificates had been purchased for, and were in, the sinking fund. Deducting these from the whole funded debt left the debt $19,000,000 less than 10 per centum of the assessed valuation of real estate. The plaintiffs complained that the city was about to issue a loan of $2,000,000 for the improvement of docks, and, counting the certificates in the sinking fund as part of the debt, this was a violation of the constitution. They therefore prayed for an injunction restraining such issue. The case was most ably and elaborately argued, both in the lower courts and in the court of appeals, which last-named court held that the intent of the constitutional prohibition was aimed "at an actual, not a theoretical, indebtedness,—at a substantial liability which can only be discharged by the enforcement of a tax or an assessment, which, when levied, will be a charge upon the taxpayer, and a burden for him to remove, not a formal obligation which may remain as evidence of a once existing debt, but which can, in no way, be regarded as a present debt to be enforced, and which if not before canceled by the commissioners, becomes waste paper by the mere efflux of time." Therefore the court held that the certificates purchased for the sinking fund were not a debt against the city, to be computed in ascertainment of the amount within the constitutional limit, and dismissed the bill. While we are not bound by the judicial construction put upon the New York constitution, yet the prohibition there is so nearly like unto ours, and the case was so exhaustively discussed in all its aspects by prominent counsel, then carefully considered by a court eminent for its learning and ability, that we cannot but give persuasive weight to the judgment, vindicated as it is, it seems to us, by the soundest reasoning.

As to the second averment of the bill,—that the debt to be created, to the extent of one half, is practically a loan of the city's credit to the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company, a private corporation,—we are of the opinion it cannot be sustained. The avoidance of grade crossings is not only desirable, but, with the growth of the city in business and population, may be considered absolutely necessary. The maimings and deaths incident to grade crossings, the records of this court show, are increasing every year. A densely populated city, dissected by a steam railroad at grade, suffers a serious interruption to travel on its streets, and permits within its limits a constant menace to life and limb. Under such circumstances, it is the city's duty to rid itself of such an obstacle to its growth, and of a danger always imminent. It has the unquestioned power to do so, if there be no legal right on the part of the railroad company interfered with. If there be such right, then it has power to make terms with the corporation, by which the corporation waives its right. And the city has the power to assume the entire expense of the municipal improvement. If the corporation, in view of advantages to it, agrees to reimburse the city to the amount of one half the expenditure, the transaction is, in no sense of the words, a loan of the city's credit to the corporation. The city makes an improvement which is a great public necessity, which largely enhances the valuation of the taxable property; it makes it at its own expense, which it has the undoubted power to do. The corporation, which is also benefited, but which is not impelled thereto by any legal obligation to the public, makes a contribution to the city of one half the cost of the improvement. It thereby obtains no loan of the city credit; simply reimburses the city for an expenditure from which the corporation was greatly advantaged.

We hold: (1) That the $23,180,100 of city certificates in the sinking fund is not a debt within the meaning of the word "debt" in section 8, article 9, of the Constitution; that the real debt of the city is the authorized debt, less the amount of the city certificates purchased and uncanceled in that fund. (2) The agreement of the city with the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company is not a loan of the city's credit to a corporation.

Sterrett, Ch. J., dissenting:

This taxpayers' bill, brought against the city of Philadelphia, and the mayor and comptroller thereof, charges, in substance: (1) That the creation of the $6,000,000 loan, authorized by the ordinance of March 15, 1894, will increase the debt of the city nearly $5,000,000 above the constitutional limit of "seven per centum upon the assessed value of the taxable property therein," in violation of section 8, article 9, of the Constitution. (2) That about $3,000,000 of the proceeds of said loan is to be expended for the use and benefit of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Company in such way as to be in fact an appropriation of money for or a loan of its credit to said railroad corporation in violation of section 7, article 9, of the Constitution; and prays that said defendants be enjoined from placing said loan, etc. In my opinion these charges are abundantly sustained, and the injunction, as prayed for, should issue on both grounds. Section 8, article 9, above referred to, declares: "The debt of any city . . . shall never exceed seven per centum upon the assessed value of the taxable property therein," etc. The history of the constitutional limitation and kindred provisions—among which is section 8, article 15, ordaining that "every city shall create a sinking fund which shall be inviolably pledged for the payment of its funded debt"—is too familiar to require extended comment. They were intended to remedy the then great and growing evil of excessive municipal indebtedness, and consequent oppressive taxation. The latter was the inevitable result of the former, and the obvious, if not the only, remedy was a reasonable limitation on municipal indebtedness. That was finally fixed at "seven per centum upon the assessed value of the taxable property therein," and became a part of the fundamental law. This limitation was of course intended for the protection of taxpayers, because the direct effect of the evil to be remedied was upon them. It was considered by the framers of the constitution that, in addition to taxation for the ordinary current expenses of municipal government, property owners should not be further taxed to any greater extent than is necessary to pay interest on a municipal debt, not exceeding the 7 per cent limit, and to maintain a sinking fund pledged for the payment of said debt at maturity. For example, if the debt of a given city, upon which it is annually paying interest, and also maintaining a sinking fund for the purpose of paying the principal at maturity, amounts to "seven per centum of the assessed value of the taxable property therein," it has reached the ultimate limit of its borrowing power, and must remain in that condition until a borrowing margin is created by reduction of its funded debt or increase of its assessed valuation. It is conceded that the present outstanding indebtedness of the city defendant is $52,578,845.22, or nearly up to the 7 per cent limit. On every dollar of that sum it is not only paying interest, but, for the purpose of paying the principal of the several loans at maturity, it is also making quarterly payments to the commissioners of the sinking fund, which fund the city, by contract with its loan holders, created and inviolably pledged to them for the payment of said loans at maturity. The fund thus created, and to the gradual increase of which the city bound itself to its loan holders, was committed to the custody and management of three persons, called "commissioners of the sinking fund," whose duty it is to invest and reinvest the same, etc., until the maturity of the corresponding loan, and then apply the same to the payment thereof in full, if the fund be sufficient; if not, then pro rata. Said commissioners are in fact and in law trustees of the said fund and the sureties which represent it,—trustees for both the city and its loan holders, but primarily for the latter, until their claims are paid. Each and every loan holder has a substantial equitable interest in each and every dollar of the fund, and securities which represent it. The legal title to the fund, including the securities belonging thereto, is in said commissioners. Within the lines of their authority as trustees, they have absolute control of it. The city has no more right to the custody and control of the securities than the loan holders have, and not as much. The sinking fund is now represented by securities amounting in round numbers to $25,000,000, about $14,000,000 of which are in certificates of the city (6 per cent loans), in which the commissioners are authorized to invest; but those city 6's are no more the property of the city than are the United States bonds or other securities in which the sinking fund is invested. In view of the authority of the commissioners to sell and reinvest, non constat that the same securities will represent the fund when the corresponding loan matured. As we have seen, the funded debt of the city, including the securities held by the commissioners of the sinking fund, on all of which it is paying and must continue to pay, interest until the corresponding loans respectively mature, is $52,578,845.22,—nearly up to the 7 per cent limit. If the proposed $6,000,000 loan is placed, the funded interest-bearing debt of the city will be $58,578,845.22, or about $5,000,000 in excess of the 7 per cent limit. That excess will, of course, necessitate an additional requisition on the taxpayers of the city for an amount sufficient to pay the interest on said excess, and provide for the payment of the principal at maturity. This would be a clear violation of the constitutional limitation, both in letter and in spirit. If it is not, there is no good reason why the excess may not be increased to the extent of $25,000,000,—the amount of securities in the sinking fund. The only justification or excuse that is suggested for this manifest violation of one of the most valuable safeguards of the constitution is that the city, in ascertaining the amount of its debt, has a right to deduct from its funded debt, on which it is now paying, and must continue to pay, interest, the amount of the city 6's now owned and held by the commissioners of the sinking fund, thus reducing its so-called "real debt" to about $88,572,845.22. This proposition is as unsound as it is novel. What are we to understand by the word "debt," as employed in the section above quoted? As everybody would naturally understand it, the debt of a city is the aggregate amount of its outstanding obligations or promises to pay. A debt is defined to be "that which is due from one person to another, whether money, goods, or services, and whether payable at present or at a future time." As defined by the Century Dictionary, indebtedness is: "(1) The state of being indebted, without regard to the ability or inability to pay the debt. (2) The amount owed,—debts collectively; as the indebtedness of an individual or a corporation." Surely the word "debt" ought to embrace, and does embrace, at least all obligations or promises to pay upon which interest is payable, and is actually paid, at stated times. As employed by the framers of the constitution and the people by whom it was adopted, the phrase "debt of any city," etc., was undoubtedly intended to mean at least all interest-bearing obligations or promises to pay.

As to the second ground. Conceding to the fullest extent the meritorious character of the purpose for which the proceeds of the $6,000-000 loan is to be used (the reconstruction by the city of part of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad, in which that company is confessedly interested to the extent of at least $3,000,000, which it promises to pay or secure to the city), the undisputed facts sufficiently show that at least the sum last named is to be expended for the use and benefit of said company in such way as to be in truth and in fact neither more nor less than an appropriation of money for, or a loan of the city's credit to, said railroad corporation, in violation of section 7, article 9, of the fundamental law. Time will not permit the discussion of this point. For reasons above suggested, I would award the injunction.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

John SAVAGE, Resp.,
v.

City of SALEM, Appt.

(23 Or. 881.)

1. Tanks erected in a street by permission of the municipality at points designated by it to assist the owner in performing his contract of sprinkling the streets cannot be treated as public nuisances per se.
2. Tanks to hold water for sprinkling streets erected in a street under license from the municipality cannot be removed by it without making compensation to the owner, unless they have become actual nuisances.

(January 9, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful removal by defendant of certain water tanks erected in a public street by a plaintiff with defendant's permission. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Darcy & Bingham, for appellant:

The erection of any structure in a street rendering it less commodious is a nuisance, and a city has no authority without the sanction of the legislature to license such a structure.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 8d ed. § 660; Elliott, Roads & Streets, 485, 486.

The authority of a city to prevent and abate nuisances should be liberally construed.

Elliott, Roads & Streets, 486.

"Public highways belong, from side to side and from end to end, to the public," and a city has no authority, unless granted by the legislature, to authorize any erection within their limits. Such erections would be unauthorized and an unauthorized obstruction is per se a nuisance.

Elliott, Roads & Streets, 478; Bybes v. State, 94 Ind. 443, 48 Am. Rep. 175; Yates v. War- renton, 84 Va. 337; Callanan v. Gilman, 107 N. Y. 360; People v. Kerr, 27 N. Y. 188; State v. Edens, 85 N. C. 522; People v. Vanderbilt, 88 Barb. 282; Emerson v. Babcock, 66 Iowa, 257, 55 Am. Rep. 273; Farrell v. New York, 20 N. Y. S. R. 12; State v. Berdella, 73 Ind. 185, 38 Am. Rep. 117; Haynes v. Thomas, 7 Ind. 38; St. Vincent Orphan Asylum v. Troy, 76 N. Y. 108, 32 Am. Rep. 286.

The municipality is itself guilty of maintaining a public nuisance, if it places a permanent obstruction in a public street.

Wartman v. Philadelphia, 33 Pa. 202; State v. Laverack, 84 N. J. L. 201.

The existence of permanent obstructions in the highway is, therefore, clearly such an unlawful act as injures the citizens who are lot owners on the street, and who have a right, as an essential incident to the enjoyment of their property, to have the street maintain its full width, free from all obstructions of a permanent character.

Smith v. State, 23 N. J. L. 712; Moyamensing Comrs. v. Long, 1 Para. Sel. Eq. Cas. 143; Wood, Nuisance, § 252; Langedale v. Benton, 12 Ind. 467; Pettis v. Johnson, 56 Ind. 129; Com. v. Blaisdell, 107 Mass. 284.

Atty-Gen. v. Ewart Boom. Co., 84 Mich. 462, defines a public nuisance as "something which subjects the people to some degree of inconvenience or annoyance."

A public nuisance is that which injures whatever portion of the public may come in contact with it.

Lansing v. Smith, 8 Cow. 146.

Between individuals, even when money has been expended by the licensee, on the faith of the license, the licensor may exercise his power of revocation.

A municipality has no more right to license or maintain a nuisance than an individual would have.

NOTE.—The above case is clearly based on the public nature of the use where tanks for sprinkling are permitted in a street. That street sprinkling is a local improvement within the rule as to 24 L. R. A.

assessments is clearly a different although a kindred question. As to this, see note to Chicago v. Blair, ante, 412.

Messrs. Bonham & Holmes for respondent.

Bean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for the removal by defendant of two water tanks which had been erected by plaintiff on State and Court streets, in the city of Salem, by permission of defendant, for the purpose of supplying his sprinkling wagons with water for street sprinkling, and comes here on appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. On the 16th of February, 1887, the city of Salem, through its common council, authorized and empowered the plaintiff, under the supervision of its street supervisor, to erect and maintain water tanks, for the purpose of supplying his street-sprinkling wagons with water with which to sprinkle and allay the dust on certain of the principal streets of the city, for a compensation by him received from the adjoining property owners. Under this authority the two tanks in question were erected by plaintiff, at the places designated, and under the supervision of the street supervisor, and were maintained and used by him for the purposes for which they were authorized until July 7, 1891, when the council ordered and directed the street commissioner to remove the tanks, which was accordingly done, after a refusal by plaintiff to remove them himself, when this action was commenced to recover damages for such removal.

The contention for appellant is—First, that the city had no power or authority to authorize the erection of these water tanks in the streets, because they were to be used for private purposes, and were therefore nuisances per se, which could be abated at any time; and, second, if this is not so, the permission to so erect them was but a mere license, revocable at the pleasure of the city. At the outset it is well to note that this case is unembarrassed by any question as to the right or remedy of an abutting property owner, or of a private individual, who has suffered some injury special to himself, and not in common with the public, from the erection or obstruction in question, but is solely a question between the municipality, which authorized the alleged obstruction, and the licensee; and hence many of the authorities cited and relied on by the defendant are not applicable to the facts of this case, or in point, and the language of the opinions in these, as in all cases, must be interpreted in the light of the particular facts as presented to the court.

As a general rule, it has been said that "public highways belong, from side to side, and end to end, to the public." State v. Berdette, 73 Ind. 185, 38 Am. Rep. 117; Elliot, Roads & Streets, 478; and hence any unauthorized, permanent erection or structure which materially encroaches upon a public street or highway, and impedes or interferes with travel, is a nuisance per se, and may be abated as such, notwithstanding ample space is left for passage by the public. But it now seems settled that municipal authorities, which possess, under their charters, general control over the streets, have the power and may authorize and render lawful obstructions and erections therein for a public purpose, which otherwise would be deemed nuisances, on the ground that such erections or structures are merely putting the street to a new and improved use, as demanded and required by the necessities of the times and the modern conveniences and appliances. It is upon this principle that the right to grant franchisees authorizing the use of the streets for water and gas pipes, for the construction and operation of street railways, the erection of water hydrants and lamp-posts, of telegraph, telephone, electric-light, and railway poles, and similar structures, is maintained and now generally recognized and upheld by the courts. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 657-697; Keasbey, Electric Wires, 86, 89; Thomp. Electricity, §§ 26, 28.

Since a municipal corporation holds its control and power over the streets in trust for the public, it has no authority to authorize or permit private persons or corporations to erect or maintain permanent obstructions therein for purely private purposes (Pettis v. Johnson, 56 Ind. 139; Emerson v. Babcock, 66 Iowa, 257; Farrell v. New York, 20 N. Y. S. R. 13), but it may authorize such erections or structures by private persons or corporations, for the purpose of serving the public, for private gain; and in such case, although such structures may in fact be or become a public nuisance, and liable to abatement as such, they cannot be held to be a nuisance per se. "It is a legal solecism to call that a 'public nuisance' which is maintained by public authority." Harris v. Thompson, 9 Barb. 350. Hence, in Com. v. Boston, 97 Mass. 555, it was held that the specifications and decisions by the mayor and aldermen of a city through which the lines of an electric telegraph company pass, made and recorded, determining the kind and location of the posts of the company in a highway, are conclusive upon the rightfulness of their erection; so that they cannot lawfully be removed by the city or its officers, or treated in any manner as a public nuisance. So, where a railroad company, under an act, granting it power to construct its road on a public highway, occupied a portion of its road, not exceeding the extent allowed by law, and obstructed travel on such portion, it was held not to be guilty of a nuisance. Danville, H. & W. R. Co. v. Com. 73 Pa. 29. To the same effect is Randle v. Pacific Railroad, 65 Mo. 325.

It follows, then, that the water tanks in question, having been erected by plaintiff, by the authority and permission of the defendant, at the places designated and selected by its agent, and under his supervision, they cannot be held to be public nuisances per se, if they were erected and maintained for public, and not private, purposes; and this depends upon whether sprinkling the streets of a municipality is a public purpose, or, in other words, a business in which the corporation itself may lawfully engage. There seems scarcely room for two opinions upon this point, so unquestionable is it that street sprinkling is a public purpose. As was said by Pierpoint, J., in West v. Baneroff, 83 Vt. 371, in sustaining the right of the city to construct a reservoir in a street for the purpose of retaining water to be used in sprinkling streets and extinguishing fires: "All those acts which tend to facilitate travel, and add to the ease, comfort, and convenience of the traveler or his beasts, whether it be by cutting down hills, filling ravines, paving roads, erecting water troughs, or sprinkling the streets, are acts which it is proper, and often necessary, for the public to do; and no other one of these acts, perhaps, would add so much to the comfort of the passers on the highway, as well as all the inhabitants of the village, as that of sprinkling the streets." And in State v. Reis, 38 Minn. 371, it was held that street sprinkling is a "local improvement," for which an assessment may be levied upon the property fronting or abutting on the street sprinkled, in proportion to its lineal feet frontage, and, in the course of the opinion, Mitchell, J., said: "That street sprinkling is a public purpose, is unquestioned." So, too, a public pump in a street has been held not to be a nuisance to an abutting lot owner, when maintained by the city authorities. Lostutter v. Aurora, 126 Ind. 486, 12 L. R. A. 259. We conclude, therefore, that the water tanks erected by the plaintiff were not nuisances per se, and could not be abated as such, and whether they were or had become in fact nuisances was a question for the jury, and its verdict is conclusive upon that matter.

Passing, now, to a consideration of the question as to the right of the city to revoke the license under which the plaintiff erected the water tanks, the rule seems to be that after a municipality has granted a license or franchise to a private person or corporation to occupy a portion of a street for public purposes, and the licensee has acted upon such grant, and expended money on the faith thereof, the city cannot revoke the license without compensation to the owner, unless the erection or structure so authorized is, or has in fact, by subsequent use, become an actual nuisance. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 814; State v. Jersey City, 49 N. J. L. 303; Com. v. Boston, 97 Mass. 555.

In this case the question as to whether these water tanks were, or by plaintiff's negligence had become, nuisances, was submitted to the jury, and, their verdict being against the city, it was not justified in revoking the license and removing the tanks, and must respond in damages to plaintiff for so doing.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Henry MERTZ

v.

Thomas A. BERRY, App't.

(.....Mich.....)

A "judgment for a tort as well as a judgment for a contract is included in the constitutional provision exempting homesteads from liability "for any debts contracted."

(June 18, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for St. Clair County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to set

NOTE.—Exemption of homestead from liability for torts.

Generally.

There are some decisions holding that a homestead is exempt from sale under judgments for torts, each case being, however, a construction of the statute or constitution of that state, as where the constitution exempts the same from sale for a "debt," a judgment for tort is held to be a debt. Dellinger v. Tweed, 66 N. C. 206; Gill v. Edwards, 87 N. C. 77.

So where the homestead is exempt from sale for any "debt" or "liability" contracted, this was held to cover a debt in tort, and "contracted" was held to mean "incurred." Smith v. Omana, 17 Wis. 395.

This Wisconsin case which is the only one which construes the words "debts contracted" in agreement with the Michigan case MERTZ v. BERRY, did not in fact base the decision on those words alone. But the court said "the word 'liability' used in conjunction with the word 'debt' is broad enough to include all claims whether founded upon tort or contract."

And an exemption "from levy and forced sale under any process or order from any court of law or equity" includes judgments ex delicto. Conroy v. Sullivan, 44 Ill. 451.

And this will exempt from sale for fine and costs. Loomis v. Gerson, 68 Ill. 11.

See infra as to "Fine or costs."

And in Massie v. Enyart, 83 Ark. 663, it was stated that the homestead could not be sold on a 24 L. R. A.

judgment for tort or costs thereon, under a statute providing that the same was not liable to sale under execution on any judgment except for purchase money taxes or trusts.

So the homestead of an attorney is not liable for his debt caused by converting to his own use a deposit as indemnity for suretyship—although the Arkansas constitution provided that attorneys and trustees of express trusts shall have no exemption against money collected by them. Sanders v. Sanders, 56 Ark. 585.

So an exemption of a homestead from sale under legal process will prevent a sale on an execution issued on a judgment in an action for a tort. Parker v. Savage, 6 Lea, 408.

But it is held by many courts that the exemption given for "debts contracted" does not apply to torts. Burton v. Mill, 78 Va. 468; Schouton v. Kilmer, 8 How. Pr. 527; Lathrop v. Singer, 99 Barb. 396; Meredith v. Holmes, 66 Ala. 190. In Burton v. Mills, supra, the action was for breach of promise. See Cook v. Newman, infra.

And an exemption given for "debts contracted" does not apply to a fine. Whiteacre v. Bector, 29 Gratt. 714, 23 Am. Rep. 420.

Nor to a penalty. Williams v. Bowden, 69 Ala. 483.

But 't was stated in Molaren v. Anderson, 81 Ala. 105, that the sheriff could not look behind the face of the judgment to determine whether the cause of action was for tort or on contract.

These cases construe the same phrase "debt contracted" as appears in the Michigan statute in the aside an execution sale of plaintiff's homestead. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edwin F. Conely and Orla B. Taylor, for appellant:

There is no homestead exemption as against a judgment in an action of tort, under our Constitution and statutes.

Kruger v. LeBlanc, 75 Mich. 424; Lane v. Baker, 2 Grant, Cas. 424.

At common law there is no homestead exemption against judgments of any kind.

The exemption is no broader than its terms, being in derogation of the common law.

Hill v. Bowman, 35 Mich. 191; Detroit Post & Tribune Co. v. Reilly, 46 Mich. 469.

The legal acceptance of "debt" is a sum of money due by certain and express agreement.

8 Bl. Com. 154.

Such is also the popular acceptance of the term.

McElfresh v. Kirkendall, 36 Iowa, 226.

A tort does not come within the scope of the word.

Ibid.

Statutes of other states either identical or similar in their terms, have been construed in accordance with our views.

Robinson v. Wiley, 15 N. Y. 439; Lathrop v. Singer, 39 Barb. 396; Schouton v. Kilmer, 8 How. Pr. 527; Ries v. McClatchey, 128 Ind. 125; Dorrell v. Hannah, 80 Ind. 497; Smith v. Wood, 83 Ind. 522; Gentry v. Purcell, 84 Ind. 83; Thompson v. Ross, 87 Ind. 156; Nowling v. McIntosh, 89 Ind. 593; State v. Melogue, 9 Ind. 196; McLaren v. Anderson, 81 Ala. 106; Fin- main case and all contrary to the constitution there given.

In Indiana where the exemption is against a judgment on a "debt growing out of contract or founded upon contract express or implied," there is no exemption on a judgment for tort. Nowling v. McIntosh, 89 Ind. 593.

But where such judgment is mixed with a judgment on contract, the creditor has reduced his rights to a level with his inferior judgment and the exemption applies. Ries v. McClatchey, 128 Ind. 125.

And there is no exemption in Georgia as against judgments for torts as the statute applies only to judgments on contracts. Davis v. Henson, 29 Ga. 345.

And under the Georgia statute the exemption is not given where the debtor is guilty of fraud, and he must make a full disclosure of his assets before entitled to exemption. McNally v. Mulherin, 79 Ga. 614.

Under the Pennsylvania Act of 1849, exempting the homestead from judgments on "contract" there is no exemption from judgments for slander or fraud. Kenyon v. Gould, 61 Pa. 202; Edwards v. Mahon, 5 Phila. 531.

In Robinson v. Wiley, 15 N. Y. 439, it was stated that if the referee had found that the statement by the purchaser of goods, that his house and lot was unincumbered except by a mortgage of $—, and that there was no other claim or incumbrance thereon, was made with fraudulent intention to cause the vendor to believe that no exemption existed, the exemption would not apply.

A claim for damages for breach of promise is not a "debt" so as to prevent an exemption where judgment is not rendered until after the filing of claim of homestead, under the proviso that no property shall be exempt for a debt contracted prior to the recording of the notice. See Burton v. Mill, 78 Va. 468; Cook v. Newman, 8 How. Pr. 524.

The court does not discuss the question as to liability for tort, and Schouton v. Kilmer, 8 How. Pr. 527, states that there is no exemption against judgments for tort.

Fines or costs.

Some courts hold that a homestead cannot be taken on a judgment for a fine or recognizance. Whiteacre v. Rector, 29 Gratt. 714, 26 Am. Rep. 420; Com. v. Dougherty, 8 Phila. 386; Loomis v. Gerson, 62 Ill. 11.

And in Com. v. Lay, 12 Bush, 283, 23 Am. Rep. 718, it was held that execution for fines imposed or for costs should not be levied on the homestead as the bill of rights required bail to be the owner of property above the statutory exemption, thereby implying that exemption was applicable in case of fines.

But under Iowa Code, section 1556, providing that a homestead shall be liable for judgments for fines and costs for violation of the liquor law, it may be taken for such judgment when used for that purpose. Arnold v. Gotshall, 71 Iowa, 572; McClure v. Braniff, 76 Iowa, 88.

Under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 703, providing for exemption "for any debt growing out of or founded upon a contract express or implied," there is no exemption from a judgment for costs in an action of tort. Russell v. Cleary, 105 Ind. 502.

In Donaldson v. Banta, 5 Ind. App. 71, it was said that a judgment for costs disconnected from any other judgment for recovery whether in an action ex delicto or ex contractu is not a "debt growing out of contract or founded upon contract, express or implied," and there is no exemption.

But in Massie v. Bnyart, 33 Ark. 688, and Loomis v. Gerson, 62 Ill. 11, it was held that a homestead was exempt from a judgment for costs, under the peculiar statutes of those states.

A homestead is not liable for a judgment in favor of the defendant, for costs in an action for tort or trover. Kruger v. LeBlanc, 75 Mich. 424; Lane v. Baker, 2 Grant, Cas. 424.

But in Schouton v. Kilmer, 8 How. Pr. 527, it was held that the homestead of the plaintiff was liable to a judgment for costs in an action of tort, as if execution be issued upon a judgment in tort there is no exemption and a judgment for costs is within the same rule as it is not a judgment for a "debt contracted."

"Official bonds."

There is no exemption in some states for liability on an official bond in the nature of a tort where the constitution exempts "for any debt contracted." Schuessler v. Dudley, 80 Ala. 547, 80 Am. Rep. 124; Vincent v. State, 74 Ala. 274.

So where the statute applies only to contracts. Brooks v. State, 54 Ga. 36.

And a constable is not entitled to the exemption laws in an execution against him for neglect of official duty. Kirkpatrick v. White, 29 Pa. 176.

No exemption will be allowed to sheriff in suit on his bond by the state as it would repeal by implication a statute making such judgment a lien—if exempt the right must be explicitly given. Com. v. Cook, 8 Bush, 220, 8 Am. Rep. 453.

But in Hume v. Gossett, 43 Ill. 297, it was held that the homestead of a tax collector could not be taken for money collected for the state, although the statute made the bond a lien on all the property of the collector—the repeal of the homestead law will not be presumed by implication.

In this note cases in regard to exemption of personality have not been included.

A broader construction has been permitted in Wisconsin, Illinois and North Carolina, but in each state the statute is much broader in its terms.

Wis. Stat. § 2983, p. 784; Smith v. Omana, 17 Wis. 395.

The word "liability" is much broader in its signification than "debts contracted," and includes torts.

McElfresh v. Kirkendall, 36 Iowa, 226; Bouvier, Law Dict.; Black, Law Dict.

In the Illinois statute "it is emphatically declared that it is the object of the act to require in all cases the wife's signature and acknowledgment as conditions to the alienation of the homestead."

Pardee v. Lindley, 81 Ill. 174, 88 Am. Dec. 219; Conroy v. Sullivan, 44 Ill. 451; Loomis v. Gerson, 62 Ill. 11.

As was pointed out in Meredith v. Holmes, 68 Ala. 190, the decision in Illinois was not reached upon a consideration of the terms of the statute alone, but by connection with and reference to certain other statutes peculiar to Illinois.

In North Carolina, also, the statute is unlike ours.

Messrs. Avery Bros. & Walsh, for appellee:

The word "debt" is used to describe an obligation to pay money, which is its general sense and so it is generally used.

The word "contracted" is not used in the restricted and narrow sense of meaning founded on contract but in its more general sense meaning incurred.

Hill v. Bowman, 85 Mich. 191; Detroit Post & Tribune Co. v. Reilly 48 Mich. 460.

Conroy v. Sullivan, 44 Ill. 451, in construing the statute says: "While a judgment for slander does not fall within the actual terms, yet under the act forbidding the alienation of the homestead without the signature of the wife it cannot be sold."

Loomis v. Gerson, 62 Ill. 11.

McGrath, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question in this case is whether, under our constitution, the homestead is exempted from levy and sale under an execution issued upon a judgment recovered in an action of tort. The constitution provides (art. 18, § 2) that "every homestead . . . shall be exempt from forced sale on execution or any other final process from the court, for any debts contracted after the adoption of this constitution." The statute provides (How. Stat. § 7721) that "a homestead . . . shall not be subject to forced sale on execution or any other final process from a court, for any debt or debts growing out of, or founded upon contract, either expressed or implied, made after the third day of July, 1848." This statute was, however, passed in 1848, before the adoption of the present constitution. Upon examination of the proceedings of the constitutional convention of 1850, it will be observed that sections 1, 2, and 3 of this article, as first reported, read as follows:

"(1) The personal property of every resident of this state shall be exempted to the amount of not less than five hundred dollars, from sale on execution or other final process of any court of law or equity.

"(2) The homestead of every family, of not less than forty acres, shall not be included in any city, village, or recorded plat, or in lieu thereof, any lot in any city, village, or recorded town plat, shall not be subject to forced sale for any debt hereafter incurred; nor shall the owner of such homestead, if he be a married man, alienate the same by any deed of conveyance, without the consent of his wife, obtained in due form of law.

"(3) The homestead of any family, after the death of the owner thereof, shall likewise be exempt from the payment of his debts contracted after the adoption of this constitution, in all cases where any minor children shall survive the death of such owner, for their benefit and support during minority." Const. Deb. 1850, p. 240.

When these sections were under consideration, it was urged that the first section was retrospective in its action; and, to obviate that objection, Mr. Pierce offered the following as an addition thereto: "Issued for the collection of any debt contracted after the adoption of this constitution." Const. Deb. 1850, p. 637. The article was again taken from the table, when a substitute was offered for sections 1, 2, and 3. Thereupon, certain amendments were offered as a substitute for the former substitute, which amendment prevailed. The article was then recommitted, with instructions. The committee immediately reported back the article, "amended agreeably to instructions." The article was then passed, and, under the rule, referred to the committee on arrangement and phraseology. Up to this time, it nowhere appears that section 2 had been amended, or that any instructions had been given respecting amendments thereto, except such as appear on pages 740 and 741, which do not relate to this subject. The committee on arrangement and phraseology reported back the article, and, in their report, the language, "for any debt contracted after the adoption of this constitution," first appeared as substituted for the language, "for any debt thereafter incurred." This would appear to have been done to make the language of the three sections uniform. The subject of exemption was very fully discussed. The retrospective effect of the first section, as it appeared when first reported, was objected to, but nowhere was any distinction hinted at between debts founded on contract and those founded in tort; and it affirmatively appears that the language added to the first section was appended for the express purpose of obviating the objection raised. The statutes existing at that time relating to the exemption of personal property exempted the property specified from levy and sale, "under any execution, or upon any other final process of a court." The Statute of 1848, relating to real property, above quoted, was clear and explicit, and clearly applies only "to debts growing out of, or founded upon, contract made after," etc. The debates furnish no indication of an intention to make the constitutional provision relating to the exemption of personal property more restrictive than the statutory provisions upon the same subject. Pending the discussion of these sections, which was a protracted one, the second section read, "any debt thereafter incurred;" and, although the section was amended in other particulars, no reference appears to have been made to this language. The word "debt" is one of large import, including debts of record or judgment. Gray v. Bennett, 3 Met. 522; New Jersey Ins. Co. v. Meeker, 87 N. J. L. 801; Re Lambie's Estate, 94 Mich. 489.

A judgment founded in tort is a debt. What, then, is the office of the language which follows the word "debt?" Is it to qualify the word "debt," or, in other words, to indicate what class of debts the exemption was intended to include, or was it used for the purpose of making the act prospective, instead of retrospective? In other words, to limit the operation of the provision to debts afterwards incurred. In view of the history recited, we are inclined to the latter view. The word "contracted" is sometimes used in a broader sense than that contended for by defendant. A disease may be contracted, while not contracted for. The words "liability, contracted," etc., have been said to have a broader signification than the words "debt contracted," etc.; but a contract liability is as much a liability growing out of a contract as is a contract debt a debt founded upon contract. In either case, if the word "contracted" can be said to qualify the word which precedes it, the result is the same, so far as the limitation of the qualified word is concerned. There are a number of authorities which hold that under such a provision the homestead is not exempt from execution issued upon a judgment founded in tort. Robinson v. Wiley, 15 N. Y. 489; Lathrop v. Singer, 39 Barb. 396; Kenyon v. Gould, 61 Pa. 292; Kirkpatrick v. White, 29 Pa. 176; McLaren v. Anderson, 81 Ala. 106; Williams v. Bowden, 69 Ala. 433; Burton v. Mill, 78 Va. 468.

In Indiana and Georgia the language is, "debts founded on contract." In Wisconsin the language is, "from liability in any form for the debts of such owner," and it is there held that the homestead is exempt from levy and sale upon a judgment founded in tort. Smith v. Orams, 17 Wis. 395. In Illinois the language is the same as ours, but there is another statute which prohibits an alienation of the homestead in any case by the husband, except with the consent of the wife, and the courts of that state have held that, in the light of both of these laws, it was the evident intent of the legislature to protect the homestead, as a shelter for the wife and children, independently of any acts of the husband. In Conroy v. Sullivan, 44 Ill. 451, the court says: "He (the husband) cannot deprive them of their right to it (the homestead) without the consent of the wife, either by his contracts or his torts."

There is no more reason, so far as the wife is concerned, for permitting it to be sold for the husband's tort, than for his violation of a contract, and it is the evident policy of the law to forbid its being sold under a judgment and execution in either case." See also Loomis v. Gerson, 63 Ill. 11. The Illinois cases have been criticised by some of the text-writers, but we think the rule laid down by that court is sound. As a general rule, only such property as the owner or debtor himself might sell can be taken in execution against him. Coombs v. Jordan, 8 Bland, Ch. 284, 22 Am. Dec. 236; French v. Mahan, 56 Pa. 286; Gentry v. Wagstaff, 14 N. C. 270; Knox v. Hunt, 18 Mo. 243. It has frequently been held by our own court that any deed, release, or mortgage, except for purchase money, of the homestead exemption, by the husband, without the signature of the wife, is void as to both. As early as the case of Beecher v. Baldy, 7 Mich. 488, it was held that, where the householder is a married man, he cannot, by any waiver, consent to a sale on execution, so as to render such sale valid, without the consent of the wife. Justice Christianity, in that case, speaking for the court, says: "For in such case the validity of the sale would rest upon his consent, in the same manner as if he had conveyed by deed; and, if deeded by him under the like circumstances, the deed would be void, even as to him, without the signature of the wife. Such, we think, is the effect of the express provision of the constitution. The object of the exemption was quite as much to protect the wife and family as the husband." Mr. Justice Campbell, in Penniman v. Perce, 9 Mich. 528, says: "The wife has an absolute vested right in the homestead, which the husband cannot waive, discharge, or destroy."

We do not think that it was the intention of the framers of the constitution to prohibit a voluntary alienation by the husband, and at the same time permit an involuntary alienation. It was not intended that a mortgage executed by the husband upon the homestead without the consent of the wife should be void, but that in case the husband represented that he was not married, and that the premises mortgaged were not a homestead, a judgment founded upon the fraud, and not upon the contract, could be enforced against the homestead property. In view of the language employed, the light thrown upon the use of the phrase by the record of the proceedings of the convention, the fact that the language of the existing statute upon the same subject was not adopted, and the effect which has already been given to this provision, as respects alienation by the husband, the provision must be construed as exempting the homestead from execution and sale upon all judgments, whether founded in tort or in contract. It may be said, also, that this constitution has for nearly 50 years received this construction, and to give it that contended for by defendant would be a surprise to the bar and people of this state.

Edgar O. DURFEE, Probate Judge.

(.....Mich.....)

A weekly journal devoted primarily to the interests of the legal profession, but containing matters of interest to the general public, such as personal items, notices of passing events, a record of property transfers and mortgages, and general trade advertisements, and having bankers, brokers, real estate agents, merchants and business men as well as judges and lawyers among its subscribers, is a newspaper within the Michigan statutes providing for publication of legal notices in a newspaper.

(June 16, 1894.)

CERTIORARI to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment denying a writ of prohibition to restrain the probate judge from appointing Patrick Lynch as administrator of the estate of Timothy Lynch, deceased, on the ground that proper notice of the application for the appointment had not been given. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edwin F. Conely and Orla B. Taylor for appellant.

Mr. Charles B. Warren for appellee.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Petitioner is one of the heirs-at-law of Timothy Lynch, deceased. On April 23, 1894, a petition was filed in the probate court for Wayne county by Patrick Lynch, a brother of petitioner, praying for the appointment of an administrator, as the deceased died intestate. An order was entered that the matter be set for hearing on May 23, 1894, and that notice of hearing be published in the Wayne County Legal News. Petitioner filed a protest against the appointment, on the ground, among others, that the Wayne County Legal News, in which the notice was published, was not a newspaper printed and circulating in said county and state within the meaning of the statute. This protest was overruled, and petitioner made application to the Wayne county circuit court for a writ of prohibition against the probate court, restraining the appointment on that ground. An order to show cause was granted, and the probate court answered. Upon the hearing, the writ of prohibition was denied. The case now comes here on certiorari to review that finding.

Section 5801, How. Stat., provides that the probate court shall appoint a time and place for proving any will, and "shall cause public notice thereof to be given by personal service on all persons interested, or by publication under an order of such court in such newspaper printed in this state as the judge shall direct, three weeks successively," etc. Section 5866 provides that "when application shall be made to the judge of probate for the appointment of an administrator on intestate estate, or for letters of administration with the will annexed, he shall cause notice of the same, and of the time and place of hearing thereof, to be published for three successive weeks in such newspaper as he may direct." Section 6808 provides: "All probate and other legal notices required by law to be published by the judge of probate of any county . . . shall be published in some newspaper printed in the county where said probate judge shall hold his court;" and section 9031 provides that "all legal advertisements shall be published in a newspaper printed in the county in which the proceedings are carried on," etc. These are the only provisions of our statutes relating to such publication. The answer of the judge of probate made to the order of the court below to show cause sets up that the Wayne County Legal News is a newspaper, published weekly in the city of Detroit, and, while devoted primarily to the interests of the legal profession and the dissemination of legal knowledge, yet it is also intended to contain, and does contain, matters of interest to the general public. It contains the proceedings of the supreme court of the state of Michigan, the Wayne circuit courts, and the other courts of the city of Detroit, and also contains notices of future proceedings in said courts. It also contains, from time to time, opinions of the courts of the United States in Michigan and the other states, and also other courts in Michigan, where the same are of interest to the legal profession or to the general public; also, personal items of general interest, and notices of passing events; and respondent asserts on information and belief that it is intended, when the legislature is in session, to contain the proceedings thereof, and general items of interest in connection therewith. It contains a record of real estate transfers and mortgages, chattel mortgages and bills of sale; also advertisements, not only relating to the legal profession, but general trade advertisements, of interest to every one; that it is intended to circulate, and in fact has a present circulation, among judges, lawyers, bankers, brokers, real-estate agents, merchants, and business men, and is intended to contain items of importance to all, and is on sale at the news stands in the city of Detroit. The answer further asserts that the Wayne County Legal News is intended to fill the same position in the county of Wayne, state of Michigan, as is filled at present by the Chicago Legal News, the St. Louis Legal Record, and other papers of similar nature in other cities; that it is not an innovation in the newspaper field, there being, as respondent asserts, upwards of forty similar journals now published. A copy of the paper is filed with this return, as well as copies of the Chicago Legal News and other legal journals, which indicate the actual character of the Wayne County Legal News, and the field which it is intended to cover. Similar provisions as sections 5801 and 5866 above referred to are to be found in the Revised Statutes of 1846. The other provisions quoted were enacted in 1868, so that these statutes were on the statute books long before the newspaper field was occupied by the many thousands of publications we now find in circulation. But a newspaper, even in the days when these statutes were enacted, meant, what it means to-day, a sheet of paper printed and distributed at short intervals for conveying intelligence of passing events; a public print that circulates news, advertisements, proceedings of legislative bodies, public documents, and the like. Under the return here we are unable to say that this paper does not come within this definition. Our statutes are quite similar to those of other states in reference to the publication of such notices. The Chicago Legal News was held to be a newspaper within the meaning of the Illinois statute. Kerr v. Hitt, 75 Ill. 51. The St. Louis Legal Record was held to be such a newspaper within the statute in Kellogg v. Carrico, 47 Mo. 157. See also Hernandez v. Drake, 81 Ill. 84; Railton v. Lauder, 126 Ill. 219, 26 Ill. App. 655; Mass v. Hess, 140 Ill. 576; Benkendorf v. Vincenz, 52 Mo. 441; Hull v. King, 38 Minn. 349; Beecher v. Stephens, 25 Minn. 146. It was said in Beecher v. Stephens, supra: "Newspapers are of so many varieties that it would be next to impossible to give any brief definition which would include and describe all kinds of newspapers. It would therefore be unsafe to attempt to give any definition of the term except the very general one that, according to the usage of the business world and in the ordinary understanding, a newspaper is a publication, usually in sheet form, intended for general circulation, and published regularly at short intervals, containing intelligence of current events and news of general interest. But if a publication contains the general and correct news of the day, it is none the less a newspaper because it is chiefly devoted to the dissemination of intelligence of a particular kind or to the advocacy of particular principles or views. Most newspapers are devoted largely to special interests,—political, religious, financial, moral, social, and the like; and each is naturally patronized mainly by those who are in accord with the views it advocates, or who are most interested in the kind of intelligence to which it gives special prominence. But if it gives the general current news of the day, it still comes within the definition of a newspaper."

In the case of Kellogg v. Carrico, supra, the question was raised as to the validity of a publication in the St. Louis County Legal Record and Advertiser. It was objected that such paper was not a newspaper. The court said: "The Legal Record and Advertiser was printed in St. Louis in the form of a newspaper, and was issued to its subscribers daily, except Sundays, when the publication was omitted. It was devoted to the dissemination of general legal intelligence, and engaged extensively in legal advertising, including the publication of notices of sales under deeds of trust and sales on execution, and all judicial sales. It was a law and advertising journal, and so, in a limited sense at least, a newspaper; for whether a newspaper or not is a question that cannot be determined by a consideration alone of the kind of intelligence it disseminates. It is not the particular kind of intelligence that constitutes one publication a newspaper rather than another. Newspapers are devoted to the dissemination of intelligence on a great variety of subjects, such as politics, commerce, temperance, religion, and so on; and the law, and legal topics and occurrences, are not excluded from the range of newspaper enterprise. A paper devoted to the gathering up and dissemination of legal news among its readers is, or at least may be, a newspaper. I regard the Legal Record as a newspaper of that character." The statute of Illinois provides that the publication of legal notices shall be in a secular newspaper of general circulation, or some paper specially authorized by law to publish legal notices, and the question was raised as to whether the Chicago Legal News came within the definition of a secular newspaper. In the case of Kerr v. Hitt, the court said: "The Chicago Legal News is published in the city of Chicago, in the county where this proceeding was commenced; is published once a week; and is devoted principally to the dissemination of legal intelligence, but makes reference to passing events, contains advertisements, brief notices of legislative bodies, personal and political items of interest to the general reader, as well as to the legal profession. Thus it will be seen it comes, substantially at least, within the definition given by lexicographers of a 'newspaper.' It is none the less a newspaper because its chief object is the publication of legal news. Many newspapers published in this and other countries are chiefly devoted to special interests,—such as religious and political newspapers; others devoted exclusively to literature,—that contain advertisements, news items (personal and political), brief notices of matters of special public concern, and reference to proceedings of legislative and other public bodies. So it is with this journal. Besides legal it contains other items of news, not only connected with the bench and bar, but others of a general interest. It is that class of journal that will circulate among lawyers and real estate and other business men, for it contains information in regard to sales of real estate, whether under judicial process or under powers. Accordingly, its advertising columns contain notices of sales under trust deeds on execution, judicial sales under decrees of court, and all manner of notices of legal transactions, as well as a limited number of other advertisements usually found in a newspaper of general circulation." In the later case of Railton v. Lauder, supra, it was held that the Chicago Daily Law Bulletin was a newspaper within the meaning of the statute, the purpose of the paper being similar to that of the Chicago Legal News.

The court below was bound by the return of the probate court as to the character of the Wayne County Legal News, and by that return it appears that such paper is as much a newspaper within the meaning of our statute as were the Chicago Legal News and the St. Louis Legal Record newspapers within the meaning of the statutes of Illinois and Missouri. We think the return of the probate court shows this journal to be a newspaper within the meaning of our statute. It has a general circulation, and contains the general news of the day; and we have no power to determine what particular paper shall publish probate notices. That question is left by statute to the probate court.

We find no error in the record, and the finding of the court below will not be disturbed. The other Justices concurred.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

Clark FERGUSON, Appt.,
v.
City of SNOHOMISH, Respnt.

- 1. The incorporation of a city so laid out as to include a dairy farm not laid out into lots or blocks, and occupied only by the owner and his family, does not violate a constitution authorizing the incorporation of cities and towns on the ground that those can extend only to cities and towns existing and cannot include any territory not actually covered by the city or town, but the boundaries of such corporations may include some territory for prospective expansion.
- 2. The taxation of a dairy farm included within city limits for general municipal purposes is not an unconstitutional taking of private property without just compensation, at least where the constitution requires that taxes shall be uniform in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction of the body levying the same.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Snohomish County in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to have certain proceedings which incorporated plaintiff's land in the city null and void, to remove a cloud by reason of sale of his land for city taxes, and to enjoin further assessment and sale of such land. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. R. Andrews, for appellant:

Corporations for municipal purposes shall not be created by special laws; but the legislature, by general laws, shall provide for the incorporation, organization, and classification, in proportion to population of cities and towns, Wash. Const. art. 11, § 10.

This section of the constitution provides for the incorporation only of cities and towns, and being in derogation of the rights of those who do not consent, or of common right, it should be strictly construed.

People v. Bennett, 29 Mich. 451, 18 Am. Rep. 115; Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 898, 894.

A town, according to Littleton, is a collection of houses, which hath, or in times past hath had, a church and a celebration of divine service, sacrament, and burials.

Co. Litt. 1155.

In the popular sense of the word a "town" is a congregation of houses so near to one another that the inhabitants may fairly be said to dwell together.

Worcester, Dict. p. 1526; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Oconto, 50 Wis. 189, 36 Am. Rep. 840.

No authority is given to incorporate villages or sparsely populated districts. The word "town" is not synonymous with "village."

Truax v. Pool, 46 Iowa, 256.

In the absence of statutory authority, to include farm lands within corporate boundaries, no such right exists, or ought to exist.

Vestal v. Little Rock, 11 L. R. A. 778, 54 Ark. 321; Shumway v. Bennett, 29 Mich. 453; 1 Dill. Mun. State*, 81 Tex. 173.

Even if the power to arbitrarily include such lands within corporate limits must be conceded, yet the power to tax them for general corporate purposes must be denied, because it is taking private property without just compensation.

Wash. Const. art. 1, § 16; Morford v. Unger, and Covington v. Southgate, supra.

Mr. L. H. Coon, for respondent:

The appellant should have presented the question of the power and authority of the respondent to tax his lands for municipal purposes, to the board of equalization, by demanding that the board strike from the assessment rolls said lands. The city council, when sitting as a board of equalization, has power to correct, modify, or strike out any assessment made by the assessor. If denied the relief sought, remove the question to the superior court by certiorari, where the power of the corporation to impose the tax could be inquired into.

The legal existence, or the illegality, or the irregularity of the proceedings whereby the people of a certain territory became incorporated cannot be collaterally drawn in question at the suit of a private party. The appellant has mistaken his remedy.

land within its boundaries, see Vestal v. Little Rock (Ark.) 11 L. R. A. 778, and note.

The legal existence of a municipal corporation, or an acting de facto corporation, cannot be attacked and judicially examined, only in a direct proceeding by quo warranto, or an information in the nature of a quo warranto.

The constitution makes it obligatory upon the legislature to provide, by suitable and proper laws, for the election, in the several counties of this state, of boards of county commissioners, prescribing their duties, and limiting their term of office. In obedience to this constitutional requirement, the legislature has passed the necessary law providing for the election, in each county in the state, of county commissioners, prescribing their duties and fixing their term of office.

Wash. Const. art. 11, § 5; 1 Hill's Wash. Code, §§ 265, 266, 270, 271, 273, 281, 494, 495.

The legislature in the further exercise of its constitutional powers, passed the Act of March 27, 1890, which is known as the act providing for the incorporation and classification of municipal corporations, and prescribing the powers of such corporations. This act, among other things, provides that any portion of a county, containing not less than three hundred inhabitants, and not incorporated, may become incorporated as a municipal corporation.

1 Hill's Wash. Code, § 493; Rohde v. Seavey, 4 Wash. 91.

When there is no constitutional impediment, the boundaries of a municipal corporation may be so changed as to include contiguous territory; and the fact that land thus brought into a corporation will be subject to taxation to discharge a pre-existing municipal indebtedness, or that it is brought in contrary to the wishes of the owner, affords no constitutional objections. Agricultural lands which have not been platted, and which are not needed for town lots, and which will receive no direct benefit from the municipal government, may thus be brought into a corporation, and taxed for municipal purposes. So, a statute which provides that lands outside of a corporation may be brought into the corporation by petition to the county commissioners, and by a majority vote of the people, is not unconstitutional, although the owner of such lands protest against having them included within the corporation. This constitutes no impairment of the owner's liberty, neither is it taking private property for public use.

The rule adopted by the courts in some of the states, which goes to the extent of denying the power to municipal corporations to tax agricultural lands within the boundaries for general municipal purposes, and in such cases affording judicial relief is, in effect, insurmountable and the decided weight of authority is against this rule. In effect this rule changes the boundaries of municipal corporations, which is a legislative and not a judicial act, and courts cannot be vested with such power.

It would work an injustice to other taxpayers of the city; taxation must be equal.

The people may organize municipal bodies and put them into operation by means of the ballot box, and this act, being political in its nature, should not be questioned by the judiciary, unless power has been delegated to the courts which authorizes them to act in such cases, and they should only interfere when it is evident that a plain and positive law has been willfully violated, and a flagrant wrong suffered. No law has been violated and no wrong suffered in this case.

Anders, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is provided, among other things, in section 10, article 11, of the State Constitution, that "corporations for municipal purposes shall not be created by special laws; but the legislature, by general laws, shall provide for the incorporation, organization, and classification, in proportion to population, of cities and towns, which laws may be altered, amended, or repealed. Cities and towns heretofore organized or incorporated may become organized under such general laws whenever a majority of the electors voting at a general election shall so determine, and shall organize in conformity therewith." By virtue of the authority conferred by this section, the legislature of the state passed an act, approved March 27, 1890, entitled, "An act providing for the organization, classification, incorporation and government of municipal corporations, and declaring an emergency." Section 1 of this act declares that "any portion of a county containing not less than three hundred inhabitants, and not incorporated as a municipal corporation, may become incorporated under the provisions of this act, and when so incorporated shall have the powers conferred, or that may hereafter be conferred, by law upon municipal corporations of the class to which the same may belong." Some time in the year 1888, the inhabitants of the village of Snohomish attempted to incorporate, under the Act of February 2, 1888, but as that act was declared void by this court in Territory v. Stewart, 1 Wash. 98, 8 L. R. A. 106, such village never had a legal corporate existence. On May 19, 1890, a petition, signed by the requisite number of persons residing within the boundaries therein prescribed, was presented to the county commissioners of Snohomish county, praying for the incorporation of a city of the third class, under the provisions of said Act of March 27, 1890. The boundaries of the proposed city, as described in the petition, included the former village of Snohomish, and, in addition thereto, some 240 acres of land belonging to appellant, which was contiguous to said village, but only forty acres of which was included therein under the attempted incorporation, by virtue of said Act of February 2, 1888. At the time of the presentation of the petition, these lands were occupied by appellant and his family only, were not laid out into town lots or blocks, but were used by him as a dairy farm exclusively; but a portion of appellant's lands abutted on the block of land upon which was situate the county court-house, and on the west and north of said premises were several additions to the town, containing altogether about sixty inhabitants. Upon the hearing of the petition, the appellant appeared before the commissioners, and objected to their including his lands within the boundaries of the proposed corporation, but offered to be satisfied if they would include the forty acres formerly included in the original village, and allow the balance to remain outside. The commissioners, however, did not see fit to change the boundaries as prayed for; and an election was ordered and held, the votes canvassed, and the incorporation was thereupon declared complete. No legal proceeding, however, was instituted by appellant to correct any supposed error on the part of the board of commissioners, or to prevent them from submitting the question of incorporation to the vote of the people, in accordance with the provisions of the statute. But after the formation of the corporation, and 24 L. R. A.

after his land had been sold for city taxes, which he neglected to pay, he brought this action to have the proceedings of the county commissioners by which his land was included within the city of Snohomish declared null and void, to remove the cloud cast upon his title to said land by said tax sale, and to enjoin said city, its officers and agents, from further assessing, or attempting to assess, or selling, or attempting to sell, his said lands and premises, or any part thereof.

The first contention of the learned counsel for the appellant is that the board of county commissioners of a given county have no right, under the constitution and laws of this state, to include, within the boundaries of a municipal corporation, lands which are used purely for agricultural purposes. But we are of the opinion that the appellant is not in a situation to question the validity of the incorporation of the city of Snohomish, for the reason that he has brought his action against it as a municipal corporation, and alleged it to be such in his complaint; and, even if he had not done so, he could not, according to the weight of authority, attack the corporate existence of the city in a collateral action like this. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 43a, and cases cited; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. p. 811.

But, irrespective of the foregoing considerations, we think the appellant's contention cannot be sustained. No irregularities in the proceedings whereby the respondent city claims to have become incorporated have been pointed out, and only the right to establish the boundaries thereof so as to include the lands of appellant is questioned. It is not denied that, in the absence of constitutional inhibition, the legislature might, by special act, have incorporated the city with its present boundaries; but it is insisted on behalf of the appellant that, inasmuch as the constitution of this state only authorizes the legislature to provide for the incorporation of cities and towns, nothing but cities and towns proper can legally be incorporated; or in other words, no territory not actually covered by the city or town desiring to become incorporated can be embraced within its limits. Several cases are cited in support of counsel's position, all of which, no doubt, were decided in accordance with the local statutes upon the subject and the facts before the court. Prominent among these cases is that of Ewing v. State, 81 Tex. 172, in which the supreme court of Texas held that the attempted incorporation of the city of Oak Cliff, containing about 2,000 inhabitants, and actually covering an area of about two square miles, so as to include within its new boundaries about ten square miles of rural territory, not part of that city, nor of any other city, and comprising farms, pastures, and unoccupied surveys of land, could not be sustained, under a statute providing that "when a city or town may contain one thousand inhabitants or over, it may incorporate as a city or town in the manner prescribed by chapter 11 of this title." But the same court, under the same statute, held in State v. Baird, 79 Tex. 68, that the incorporation of a town may properly include the territory occupied by the persons attending church, sending to the schools, and residing near to others making up the proposed town; and that this may be done regardless of whether the lands be laid out into lots or blocks. In the course of the opinion, the court observed that "it may not always be practicable to incorporate a town without including within its limits some territory devoted to purely pastoral or agricultural pursuits. Something may be allowed for prospective expansion." Our statute concerning the incorporation of towns and cities is broader than that of Texas, upon which those decisions were based. In providing a method for the incorporation of cities, and towns, the legislature recognizing the impossibility of fixing by a general law the exact boundaries of every municipality that might be organized thereunder, left that important question to be determined by the county commissioners and the people within the limits of the proposed incorporation; and, when they provided that any portion of a county containing not less than three hundred inhabitants may become incorporated they did not intend to confine the corporation to the exact limits of any pre-existing town or city, but did intend to allow something for "prospective expansion." We are not prepared to say that the statute under which the city of Snohomish became incorporated is in contravention of the constitution; nor are we prepared to hold that the appellant's lands were not legally included within the city limits. This court held in Re Campbell, 1 Wash. 287, that the inhabitants of towns which had attempted to incorporate under the void Act of February 2, 1888, may incorporate under the Act of March 27, 1890, with a larger territory than that included in the original boundaries. While it is true that a town or city cannot exist upon entirely vacant and unoccupied lands, we think it is equally true, as was said in Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 104 U. S. 78, 26 L. ed. 653, that the question of "how thickly or how sparsely a territory within a city must be settled is one of the matters within legislative discretion."

But it is further contended by the appellant that, even if his lands were properly included within the corporate limits of a city, they are not subject to taxation for general municipal purposes, because such taxation would be a taking of private property without just compensation. This view of the law, although favored by the courts of Iowa and Kentucky (Morford v. Unger, 8 Iowa, 82; Covington v. Southgate, 15 B. Mon. 498), is contrary to the great weight of authority in this country. In regard to municipal taxation, our constitution provides that "such taxes shall be uniform in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction of the body levying the same;" and the doctrine contended for by appellant is in direct contravention of that provision, and must therefore be rejected. Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 626; Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. pp. 158, 159; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 794, 795; Powers v. Wood County Comrs. 8 Ohio St. 285; *Blanchard v. The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT

Annie E. BURGESS

v.

John F. MULDOON.

(.....R. L.....)

All inchoate interest as tenant by the curtesy is destroyed by an absolute divorce, unless it is preserved by statute.

(June 1, 1894.)

PILL to compel specific performance of an agreement to purchase certain real estate which defendant refused to do because he alleged that the title was defective. Decree for plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. McGuinness & Dolan, for complainant:

Upon a decree dissolving a valid marriage, equally as upon a sentence of nullity, all the husband's claim to the lands of his wife ceases; and she is entitled to recover immediate possession of them.

2 Bishop, Mar. & Div. 5th ed. 1873, § 712, and cases.

Mr. John W. Hogan, for respondent:

4 Kent, Com. 10th ed. p. 84, note a, says: "Whether a divorce a vinculo will destroy curtesy depends on circumstances, and there is some variety in the laws of the several estates. If the cause for divorce be for causes arising before marriage, the right to curtesy, as well as to other rights growing out of marriage is gone but if for causes subsequent to marriage, the rule is not absolutely stable and uniform."

Curtesy initiate in Rhode Island is an assignable estate. It was so at common law. So that whatever may be said in favor of the wife's right of dower surviving the shock of divorce will apply with greater force to the right of curtesy of the husband.

2 Scribner on Dower, 2d ed. pp. 542-557, shows that while in England the divorce for adultery was in form only a mensa et thoro, yet a divorce for that cause enabled the husband to marry again; yet by § 13, p. 548, a divorce a mensa et thoro for adultery by the wife did not bar dower. And it shows § 18, p. 547, that when divorces were granted by act of parliament, it was the custom to add a clause expressly barring the dower of the wife.

It was established in New York by the case Wait v. Wait, 4 N. Y. 95, that where a divorce was granted for a cause accruing subsequent to marriage, dower was not affected by the divorce.

Our Married Woman's Property Act (Pub. Stat. chap. 166, § 14), saves the husband's right by the curtesy.

Tillinghast, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill for the specific performance of an agreement to purchase a lot of land in the city of Providence. It is resisted on the ground of an alleged imperfection in the title to said land. The bill shows that the complainant purchased the land in 1878 (she then being the wife of William H. Burgess), and has owned it ever since; that at the October term, 1890, of this court, the said William H. Burgess was granted a divorce from the complainant on the ground of extreme cruelty and desertion; and that the respondent refuses to carry out and perform his agreement to purchase said land because the complainant being a married woman, as aforesaid, at the time when she purchased said land, and having had children of said marriage, the said William H. Burgess, being still alive, is entitled, under the statutes of this state, to an estate for life in said land.

The only question raised by the bill and answer may be stated thus, viz.: Has a husband who obtained a divorce from his wife in this state in 1890, on the ground of extreme cruelty, any interest, as tenant by the curtesy, in the real estate owned by his wife at the time of the granting of the divorce; she having purchased said estate in 1878, and having had children by him, born alive, during the subsistence of the marriage? We think this question must be answered in the negative. At the common law, the husband, upon the birth of living issue of the marriage, becomes tenant by the curtesy initiate of all the real estate of his wife, but can only become tenant by the curtesy consummate by her death. Day v. Cochran, 24 Miss. 261; 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 958. In short, in order to constitute tenancy by the curtesy consummate, three things must take place while the marriage continues, viz., seisin of the wife, issue born alive capable of inheriting, and death of the wife. 1 Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 479; Wheeler v. Hotchkiss, 10 Conn. 280; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. pp. 172, 173; Schouler, Dom. Rel. 3d ed. § 202. See also Re Voting Laws, 12 R. I. 589.

In the case at bar the divorce put an end to the marital relations, by absolutely dissolving the bond of matrimony, and thus rendering it impossible for the husband's right as tenant by the curtesy to ever become consummate. 2 Bishop, Mar. & Div. 5th ed. § 712, and cases cited; Gould v. Crow, 57 Mo. 24 L. R. A.

204. In other words, the divorce cut off and destroyed the husband's right as tenant by the curtesy, unless the right is preserved to him by statute. Barrett v. Failing, 111 U. S. 524, 28 L. ed. 505, and cases cited.

The respondent's counsel contends that it is thus preserved, under the provisions of R. I. Pub. Stat., chap. 167, § 5. Said section provides as follows: "Whenever the divorce shall be occasioned by adultery or other of the causes aforesaid, done or committed on the part of the wife, the husband shall hold the personal estate not secured to her by law, forever, and her real estate not secured to her by law during his natural life, in case they have had issue born alive of her body during the marriage, otherwise during her natural life only, if he shall survive her." This statute, in substance, appears as early as the Revision of 1798, which was long before any act had been passed regulating the property rights of married women. It appears in the Revision of 1822, on page 869, in the following language, viz.: "Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, that when a divorce shall be had for the causes of affinity, consanguinity, impotency, idioy or lunacy of either of the parties, the wife shall have restored to her all her lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and a judgment may be passed for a restoration to her of all or such part of the personal estate specifically, or the value thereof, which hath come to the husband's hands, by virtue of the marriage, as the justices of the supreme judicial court, from all the circumstances of the case, shall deem equitable, and they may make use of such process to carry their judgments into effect, as shall be necessary; and when the divorce shall be occasioned by adultery, or other of the causes aforesaid, done or committed on the part of the wife, the husband shall hold the personal estate forever, and her real estate during his natural life, in case they have had issue born alive of her body during the marriage, otherwise during her natural life only, if he shall survive her: provided nevertheless, that the court may allow her, for her subsistence, so much of such personal or real estate as they shall judge necessary." This statute, without any material modification, appears in the Revision of 1844, in which revision also appears the first act concerning the property of married women. In the Revision of 1857 the statute last above quoted was modified so as to permit the husband, when the divorce was obtained for any of the causes mentioned, done or committed on the part of the wife, to hold the personal estate, "not secured to her by law," forever, and her real estate, "not secured to her by law," during his natural life, in case they had issue born alive of her body during the marriage; otherwise, during her natural life only, if he should survive her. Under the provisions of chapter 136 of said last-named revision, the real estate, chattels real, and personal estate, which were the property of any woman before marriage, or which became hers after marriage, or which was acquired by her own industry, were so far secured to her sole and separate use that the same was not attachable, or in any way liable to be taken, for the debts of the husband, either before or after his death, and, upon his death in the lifetime of the wife, remained her sole and separate property. In the Revision of 1872, while the provision relating to the effect of a divorce, on the property of the wife, obtained by the husband, remains precisely the same as in said Revision of 1857, yet the property rights of married women were very materially changed, in that her property above specified was absolutely secured to her sole and separate use. The Revision of 1882 contains the same provisions, respectively, concerning the effect of a divorce on the wife's property, and of her absolute right to said property. Construing said provisions relating to the effect of a divorce on the separate property of the wife, with those absolutely securing said property to her, as we are bound to do, it will be seen that the former has been so far modified by the latter as to be practically nullified that is to say, as the real estate of a married woman is now absolutely secured to her sole and separate use subject only to the husband's right as tenant by the curtesy (R. I. Pub. Stat. chap. 166, § 14), and as the divorce cuts off this right also, as we have already seen, there is no real estate left which is not secured to the wife by law, and hence nothing upon which the statute can operate. See last part of note on page 822, of 1 Washburn on Real Property.

We are therefore of the opinion that said William H. Burgess has no interest whatever in the land in question, and hence that the complainant is entitled to the relief prayed for.

There is a great deal of conflict in the decisions as to whether or not the maturity of a note which is one of several secured by a mortgage controls as to its priority, or whether such priority shall be controlled by the date of the assignment or whether the proceeds of the sale of the property shall be divided pro rata between the holders of the several notes without regard to the maturity of the note or to the date of the assignment. The line of decision having been adopted in several states, it has been maintained by them and it would be impossible to reconcile them. Many states hold that the pro rata rule of distribution should govern, as, Smith v. Stevens, 49 Conn. 181; Lewis v. De Forest, 20 Conn. 427; Phelan v. Olney, 6 Cal. 430; Grattan v. In Todd v. Cremer, 36 Neb. 430, it is held that an assignment of different notes to different parties is an assignment pro tanto of the mortgage securing them and the several holders are entitled to share pro rata in the proceeds. This term of an assignment pro tanto would seem to imply that an assignment transfers to the holder thereof so much of the mortgage and is based upon the statement in Studebaker Bros. Mfg. Co. v. McCargur, 20 Neb. 501, where it states that in those states where a mortgage is a mere lien, an assignment of one of the notes is an assignment pro tanto; but it was held in the Studebaker Case that all the notes share pro rata. The same expression is copied from the Studebaker Case and used in Harmon v. Barbydt, 20 Neb. 625. The same expression in regard to an assignment pro tanto is used in Burnett v. Hoffman (Neb.) May 15, 1894, which holds that a suit by the holder of one installment note cannot prejudice the rights of others.

In the absence of express stipulation, there is no priority between the assignees of mortgage notes, and all are entitled to share in the proceeds pro rata without regard to the maturity. First Nat. Bank of Aberdeen v. Andrews, 7 Wash. 261.

But in Miller v. Washington Sav. Bank, 5 Wash. 200, it was held that the holder of the note first as-not constitute a failure of proof to sustain a finding in plaintiff's favor where the execution of the indorsements was not denied so as to require them to be put in evidence.

A PPEAL by defendant Mary E. Horn, from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Fulton County and from an order denying her motion for a new trial in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage which secured notes held by plaintiff and by the appealing defendant, which judgment provided that from the proceeds of the foreclosure the notes held by the plaintiff should be first paid. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. Isaiah Conner for appellant.

Mr. J. W. Rickel for appellees.

Olds, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit for the foreclosure of a mortgage, instituted by the appellee Charles O. Bennett against the appellant, Mary E. Horn, and Enock Myers and his wife, Mahila, and William W. McMahan and his wife, Julia F., to foreclose a mortgage on lands therein described, and situate in the county of Fulton, in the state of Indiana, to secure the payment of a series of seven notes, each dated December 2, 1889, the first one of which notes, by its terms, became due on or before December 2, 1890, and each of the others, by its terms, on or before the 2d day of December thereafter, annually, until all should mature. The mortgage securing the notes contained the following stipulation: "It is agreed and understood by the parties hereto, upon the failure to pay any one of said notes at maturity, then all of said notes shall become due and payable, and this mortgage may be foreclosed." Each of said notes had been assigned, before this action was commenced, by indorsement on the back thereof,—the first five to the appellee Bennett, and the last two to this appellant, who was made a defendant in the complaint of said appellee Bennett to foreclose the mortgage, and she filed her cross complaint to foreclose said mortgage as to the two notes which she owned. Issues were joined, and trial had, and a decree of foreclosure entered, giving to the appellee Bennett priority as to the notes held by him, and that the proceeds arising from the sale be first applied to the payment of the sum found due on the notes owned by said Bennett, and the surplus, if any, to be applied on payment of the sum found due on the notes owned by the appellant.

Appellant moved the court to modify the judgment and decree so as to place the sums due on each on an equality, and allow her to share pro rata in the fund derived from the sale, which motion was by the court overruled, and exceptions reserved, and this signed had the priority. In First Nat. Bank of Aberdeen v. Andrews, supra, the court says that no general rule was attempted to be announced but that this decision was upon the particular circumstances of the case.

It was stated in Pennybaker v. Tomlinson, 1 Tenn. Ch. 111; Re Sewall's Petition v. Brainerd, 38 Vt. 264; West Branch Bank v. Chester, 11 Pa. 290, 51 Am. Dec. 547,—that the creditors share in the funds pro rata without regard to the maturity of the note held by them secured by the same mortgage, but this was not the question involved.

Where several notes are secured by the same mortgage and assigned to different persons, each one will acquire an equitable interest in the mortgage; but the interest of any one may be lost where an innocent person has been misled by improper representations, or by the silence of the holder of such mortgage, when it was his duty to speak. Anderson v. Baumgartner, 27 Mo. 80.

It was held in Swartz v. Leist, 13 Ohio St. 419, "that if several promissory notes are jointly secured by mortgage, the assignee of one of these notes so secured becomes equitably entitled to a pro rata participation in the benefit of the security." But in that case there was no question as to priority of right as between notes differing in date of maturity. A note was given to the mortgagee, who assigned it, and then canceled the mortgage. The property having been sold the point was, Could the note be enforced against an innocent purchaser of the land? But see Bank of United States v. Covert, and Kyle v. Thompson, infra.

Pro rata as to notes made to different parties.

And it is generally held that, where two mortgage notes are executed at the same time maturing at different times and given to different parties, they are entitled to share pro rata in the proceeds. Collered v. Huson, 34 N. J. Eq. 38; Thayer v. Campbell, 9 Mo. 277; Burnett v. Pratt, 22 Pick. 556; 24 L. R. A.

A note secured by mortgage indorsed to A and B, entitles each to one half the note and its proceeds, as well as the security, and neither can transfer any other or greater interest. Herring v. Woodhull, 29 Ill. 92, 31 Am. Dec. 296.

Priority as regulated by maturity.

Many cases hold that the priority of notes secured by the same mortgage in the hands of different holders is controlled according to the date of their maturity without regard to the date of the assignment, sustaining the rule announced in the main case.—HORN v. BENNETT. Walker v. Schreiber, 47 Iowa, 529; Sangster v. Love, 11 Iowa, 580; Grapengether v. Fejervary, 9 Iowa 163, 74 Am. Dec. 336; Rankin v. Major, 9 Iowa, 297; *Gerber v. ruling is assigned as error. The same question is presented by a motion for new trial, the court finding as a fact that appellee Bennett had a prior lien for the sum found due him on the first five notes, and the appellant had a subsequent or junior lien for the sum found due her on the two notes owned by her, being the sixth and seventh notes, and the notes last due in the series of seven. That under the stipulation in the mortgage all the notes matured and became due on the failure of the payor to pay the note due first, and that this was a failure to pay the note first due before the commencement of the suit, making all of the notes due before suit was commenced, is not doubted or questioned by either the appellant or appellees. That the notes did all mature upon failure to pay the first has been settled by this court. Moore v. Sargent, 112 Ind. 484. It is also the settled law of this state that when a series of notes falling due at various dates are secured by mortgage, without any condition in the mortgage such as is in the one in the suit at bar, whereby they mature earlier than the date fixed in the note on failure to pay any one when it matures, in case of an assignment of the notes to various persons they will be treated as several mortgages, and the persons holding the notes maturing first will have a prior lien to those holding the notes maturing subsequently thereto. This has been the rule in this state since the decision in the case of State Bank v. Tweedy, 8 Blackf. 447, 46 Am. Dec. 486, and has been uniformly so held whenever the question has been presented. Doss v. Ditmars, 70 Ind. 451; Gerber v. Sharp, 73 Ind. 553, and authorities cited in this opinion. Many other authorities might be cited. In this case it is contended by counsel for the appellant that the notes must be treated as all maturing at the same time, and that assignment transferred but a pro rata interest in the mortgage security, and that this question is an open and new one in this state, never having been passed upon by this court, while, on the other hand, counsel for appellees contend that the condition in the mortgage, upon which all of the notes should mature on failure to pay the note first due, in no way changed the rights of the parties; that they are the same as if they matured in the order and at the time named in the note; and that the decisions in People's Sav. Bank of Evansville v. Finney, 63 Ind. 460, and Doss v. Ditmars, 70 Ind. 451, are decisive of the question in appellees' favor. In the latter case there was a condition in the mortgage similar to the one in this case, but it was not considered or discussed, or treated as having any bearing upon the case; and in the case of People's Sav. Bank of Evansville v. Finney, supra, the assignee of the first note extended the time of payment until after the subsequent notes matured, and the holders

It was said in Anderson v. Sharp, 44 Ohio St. 280, no doubt exists but that between the assignees of notes maturing at different times and secured by the same mortgage, the holders, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, are entitled to be paid in the order that the notes mature, and, in the case of a sale of the land, the proceeds are to be marshaled accordingly.

And it was said in Re Sewall's Petition v. Brainerd, 88 Vt. 364, that where the bondholders had obtained a decree for a receiver, the net earnings only after paying the rent and expenses is to be appropriated upon the mortgage debt, and the coupons first falling due were to be paid first, but that would be different on a final distribution, as then it would be pro rata.

And in Hunt v. Stiles, 10 N. H. 466, it was said that where only one note had fallen due, that an entry to foreclose must be on that note.

And in Crouse v. Holman, 19 Ind. 30, it was held that a judgment of foreclosure on one note cannot be pleaded as a bar to a subsequent suit on another note secured by the same mortgage—as each note might be considered as a successive mortgage.

And Mich. Stat., subdivision 4, section 8498, providing that in installment mortgages each note after the first shall be a separate mortgage and may be foreclosed as such, includes installments of interest as well as principal. Edgar v. Beck, 98 Mich. 419.

The party paying off the first of a series of notes and taking an assignment of the same without the knowledge of the mortgagee is not entitled to preference. Bailey v. Malvin, 53 Iowa, 371.

And the last note held by an assignee has priority over a note falling due before which in reality was paid by an exchange of property between the mortgagor and mortgagee. Massachusetts Loan & T. Co. v. Moulton, 81 Iowa, 155.

8. It has been held that mortgage notes secured by the same instrument have priority according to 24 L. R. A.

to their maturity as originally made, without regard to the clause in the mortgage that the nonpayment of the note or interest shall mature the whole. Leavitt v. Goodwin, 7 L. R. A. 305, 79 Iowa, 348; Freeman v. Elliott, 43 Mo. App. 74; Gardner v. Diederichs, 41 Ill. 153; Hurok v. Erakine, 45 Mo. 485; Mitchell v. Ladew, 36 Mo. 523, 38 Am. Dec. 156.

So maturity as originally written controls and the overplus after satisfying the first note must be held by the trustee for the holders of the others although the deed does not state that default in one shall mature the others. Huffard v. Gottberg, 54 Mo. 271.

But some cases hold that the maturity of all the notes by reason of nonpayment of one changes the order of priority, and that all being matured, the proceeds will be distributed pro rata. Bushfield v. Meyer, 10 Ohio St. 334; Pierce v. Shaw, 51 Wis. 515.

And in Marine Bank of Buffalo v. International Bank, 9 Wis. 57, it was held that as there was no election by the holder of the mortgage to mature, that it would be incorrect to assume that all became due at the same time.

Priority as regulated by contract of assignment.

The priority rights of the holder of any note and the liens securing the same may be regulated by contract of assignment so that the usual rules of maturity or pro rata distribution would not apply. McVay v. Bloodgood, 9 Port. (Ala.) 547; Exchange Bank v. Eddy, 10 Week. L. Bull. 369; Morgan v. Kline, 77 Iowa, 681; Rolston v. Brookway, 23 Wis. 407; Langdon v. Keith, 9 Vt. 239; Wright v. Parker, 3 Aik. 212; Thayer's App. (Pa.), May 2, 1887; Granger v. Crouch, 86 N. Y. 494; Mechanics Bank v. Bank of Niagara, 9 Wend. 410; Norton v. Stone, 5 Paige, 222, 4 L. ed. 407; Dunham v. W. Steele Pkg. & Provision Co. (Mich.), April 10, 1894; Norton v. Palmer, 142 Mass. 423; Foley v. Rose, 123 Mass. 557; Bryant v. Damon, 6 Gray, 564; Anglo-American of the junior notes sought to postpone the lien of the holder of the senior notes, and have it decreed to be a junior lien, on account of the extension of time of payment, and it was held that this could not be done; that the priority of liens was not affected by the extension of the payment.

The question presented in this case does not seem to have been considered and decided by this court, although the two decisions last referred to tend to support the contention of the appellees. The decisions of other states where the question has been passed upon are in conflict,—some holding that the assignees take pro rata, and some that they take pro tanto; but it may be remarked that there is a like difference in the holdings of the courts of other states, where the notes held by assignees mature at different dates. In Parkhurst v. Watertown Steam Engine Co., 107 Ind. 594, the law of this state is stated to be "that an indorser of a part of such notes so secured by mortgage is entitled, in equity, to payment out of the mortgage funds in preference to the notes retained by the mortgagee and assignor, although the notes so assigned may fall due subsequently to those retained by the mortgagee." This modifies to some extent the rule as held in State Bank v. Twedy, supra. It is also intimated, or suggested, rather, in the case of Parkhurst v. Watertown Steam Engine Co., supra, that a difference in the rule as to priority might exist between the assignees of notes assigned at different dates, and the assignees of notes assigned at the same date. It is a well-settled rule in equity that when the owner of real estate incumbered conveys a part to one purchaser for value, and afterwards conveys to another purchaser the remainder, equity will compel the creditor to resort to the real estate last conveyed, and in case it is sufficient to pay the debt the tract first sold will be freed from the lien, thereby giving the first purchaser the priority or advantage. When the notes and mortgage in suit were executed and assigned the presumption existed that the note would be paid at maturity. At the time the parties took the assignment the notes were payable at different dates, the notes assigned to the appellee Bennett being payable at a prior date than those assigned to the appellant. As they stood at the date of the assignment, they were not collectible until the date named in each for their maturity. Had the maker and mortgagor not made default in the payment, under the law of this state the appellee Bennett had the prior mortgage, securing the notes assigned to him. We do not think the rights of the parties were changed by the subsequent default of the mortgagor in the payment of the first note. Such default was not brought about by any act of the assignee of the notes first due, nor had he any control over the matter. In considering this ques-

Land Mortg. & Agency Co. v. Bush, 84 Iowa, 272; Walker v. Dement, 42 Ill. 272; Redman v. Purrington, 65 Cal. 271; Bank of England v. Trelton, 23 Miss. 173; Solberg v. Wright, 33 Minn. 224; Chew v. Buchanan, 30 Md. 367.

And so a contract may control giving the holders of the various notes pro rata rights. Howard v. Schmidt, 23 La. Ann. 129.

But an agreement that one who advances money to pay one note shall have a preference does not affect any one except the party so contracting and as to the others it will be concurrent. La Place v. La Place, 43 La. Ann. 284.

But the consent of the second mortgagee that the balance of the proceeds of sale under a first mortgage may be paid to the purchaser of the equity of redemption will not authorize such payment as against the mortgagor without discharging the debt secured by such mortgage, and a holder of one of the notes may levy on the equity of redemption to satisfy the same. Andrews v. Fiske, 101 Mass. 422.

In Kimmell v. Willard, 1 Dougl. (Mich.) 217, it was held that on the foreclosure of an installment note under Mich. Rev. Stat., 501, chap. 8, where the bid was only for the amount of such note, that the premises was forever disencumbered of the mortgage. But see Edgar v. Beck, 96 Mich. 419, as to present statute.

But in Sample v. Rowe, 24 Ind. 208, it was held that the assignment of one or more obligations secured by the same mortgage will carry with it so much of the mortgage. This was a controversy between the owner of land purchased from the mortgagor and a bondholder.

And the holder of a mortgage note could redeem from mortgage sale notwithstanding a judgment by the holder of an assigned prior note, to which judgment such holder was a party. Davis v. Langsdale, 41 Ind. 399.

Some cases hold that parol evidence is not admissible to vary the legal effect of priority as 24 L. R. A.

given by a written assignment. Hancock's App. 34 Pa. 155; Jennings v. Moore, 33 Mich. 231; Lane v. Davis, 14 Allen, 226.

So many of the cases supra, as Grattan v. Wiggins, 23 Cal. 16; Winters v. Franklin Bank of Cincinnati, 33 Ohio St. 250; Humphreys v. Morton, 100 Ill. 522; Dixon v. Clayville, 44 Md. 578; Penzel v. Brookmire, 51 Ark. 105; Cooper v. Ulmann, Walk. Ch. 261; English v. Carney, 25 Mich. 178; Hall v. McCormick, 31 Minn. 281; Pugh v. Holt, 27 Miss. 461; Jeffersonville College Trustees v. Prentiss, 29 Miss. 46; Terry v. Woods, 6 Smedes & M. 139, 45 Am. Dec. 274; Goar v. McCanless, 60 Miss. 244; Furbush v. Goodwin, 25 N. H. 425; Orleans County Nat. Bank v. Moore, 3 L. R. A. 802, 112 N. Y. 543; McLean's App. 103 Pa. 255; Ewing v. Arthur, 1 Humph. 587; Christian v. Clark, 10 Lea. 630,—state that priority may be regulated by the contract at the time of assignment, but that was not the question involved.

In Stevenson v. Black, 1 N. J. Eq. 338, it was said that an assignment of one of several bonds makes the assignee equitably interested in the mortgage to the amount of his debt or bond, and the assignor holding the mortgage was a trustee for such assignee pro tanto and so in like manner he is the trustee for the assignees of the other bonds to the amount of their bond.

And in Brown v. Delaney, 22 Minn. 349, where three notes first maturing out of five secured, were assigned by a sealed instrument as follows: "The mortgage and the lien created thereby . . . or so much thereof as shall secure the payment of the three notes," it was held that the assignee had the legal title for the purpose of collecting his three notes.

But in Henderson v. Herrod, 10 Smedes & M. 631. It was questioned whether the assignor could affect the priorities by his assignment.

And it is generally held that as against the assignor the assignee of notes assigned is entitled to a prior lien over any retained by the assignor.

tion in the case of Leavitt v. Reynolds, 79 Iowa, 348, 7 L. R. A. 365, the supreme court of Iowa says: "In this state, and in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Alabama, and some other states, the pro tanto or priority rule is followed, under which the notes first maturing are treated as prior, and to be first paid in full out of the security." The appellant contended in favor of the pro rata rule, and the court further says: "To apply the rule contended for by the appellant in a state where the pro tanto rule is the established law would add an element of uncertainty to mortgage securities that would affect their value. Such a rule would render it uncertain whether, under mortgages like this, the security would be applied pro rata or pro tanto. Take the case of three notes and mortgage, like these under notice, as an illustration: A party knowing that under the laws of the state the notes are entitled to priority according to the order of their maturity, and knowing the security to be sufficient for the first two notes, but insufficient for the whole, purchases and pays for the two notes first falling due on that basis. If the maker may, by defaulting, deprive these notes of their priority, then surely they would not be purchased so readily, nor at such a price. The rule contended for would render it possible for the mortgagor and holder of the notes last falling due to defeat the holder of the first notes of his priority by the makers failing to pay the interest on the last note, whereby all became due, and the holders of the last be entitled to a pro rata share of the security. Notes of this description, secured by mortgages and deeds of trust, enter largely into the business transactions of the state, and the courts should hesitate before pronouncing a rule that would render it uncertain whether security for such notes would be applied pro rata or pro tanto. Our conclusion is that the maturity of the notes by reason of default in making prior payment is not such a falling due as should change the rule for the application of the security." The court further says: "One of the grounds upon which the pro tanto rule is supported is that making the notes mature at different times evidences an agreement that they are to have priority in the order in which they fall due. Hence cases of default, like this, are not such a falling due as expunges from the contract the agreement as to priority." We think this statement of the Iowa supreme court enunciates the better rule, and is in harmony with the holdings of this court, on the question of priority of liens, and assignees of notes take a pro tanto interest in the mortgage security, with priority according to the dates at which their notes mature, as stated in the notes, and that this rule, or their priority, is not changed by the default in payment by the mortgagor and maker, in the failure to pay either the principal or interest of any note at maturity, by which default all of the notes mature. It follows from the conclusion we have reached that there is no error in the record.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed in response to which on October 11, 1893, Dailey, J., on behalf of the court delivered the following opinion:

In the petition for a rehearing in this case the appellant does not challenge or question the doctrine declared in State Bank v. Tweedy, 8 Blackf. 447, 46 Am. Dec. 486, that a mortgage given to secure the payment of two or more notes, maturing at different times, must be considered as if there were as many successive mortgages as there are notes secured, and that the holder of the note first due has priority, and each note has preference in the order of its maturity; but she urges that there is more than this involved in the controversy, because the mortgage securing the notes contains this stipulation: "It is agreed and understood by the parties hereto, upon the failure to pay any one of said notes at maturity, then all of said notes shall become due and payable, and this mortgage may be foreclosed,"—and takes the case out of the operation of the rule, places it within the exception, and entitles the holders to participate ratably in the funds derived from the

And in Forwood v. Dehoney, 5 Bush, 174, it was stated that the assignee would have a priority as against the assignor, but as he did not claim more than pro rata, he was not allowed priority.

But it was held in Donley v. Hays, 17 Serg. & R. 400, that where the mortgagee assigns part of the bonds payable at different times as between the assignee and mortgagee the fund is to be distributed pro rata.

In Church v. Smith, 39 Wis. 492, it was held that a transfer of a part of the purchase money note is a transfer of the lien pro tanto, and on a foreclosure by the assignor on notes held by him he will hold the title to an undivided portion as trustee for his assignee. The amount of the assignee's interest being proportioned to his interest in the unpaid purchase money.

security, if there be not enough to pay all. Under this doctrine the proceeds would be applied pro rata in part payment of the several notes, irrespective of the dates of maturity or assignment. Upon this question there are two lines of decision; the one declaring that there is a preference in the distribution of the proceeds in favor of the holders of the pre-existing priorities, the other that the parties must share the proceeds pro rata. The latter position is not supported by an Indiana authority, and we cannot adopt appellant's contention. We think the policy of this state as to the point involved has been long since settled; that is, that the assignment of the note first maturing carries with it a pro tanto interest in the mortgage security,—pro tanto, and not pro rata,—for so much, in other words, and not in proportion. When the notes first maturing were assigned to the appellee Bennett, such act constituted a contract between him and the mortgagee, Landis, which may be formulated in these words: "I herewith transfer to you so much of this mortgage as is sufficient to pay the five notes which I have sold you. If it require all, you shall have it; but, if not, then what remains shall be applied to the other notes secured thereby." Such an assignment is not a transfer of the undivided five sevenths of the mortgage security. After such an assignment, what is left in the mortgagee to sell and transfer to the appellant is measured by what remains after deducting what he sold appellee Bennett from all he had originally. When he sold the remaining two notes to the appellant, the contract arising from the transfer may be thus stated: "I herewith assign to you whatever is left of this mortgage after the notes assigned to Bennett have been fully paid out of it." If the pro rata rule obtained, this last would be a transfer of two sevenths of the mortgage security. The rule in this state is not affected by a previous transfer of the notes last due. When Landis had completed the last assignment, and appellee Bennett became the owner of the first five notes of the series, and the appellant of the last two of the notes so secured, the rights of the assignees were fixed and vested as between themselves, and the parties are presumed to have contracted with a knowledge of the law governing such transactions. Bennett, then, had a right, as against appellant, to use just as much of the mortgage security as might be required to pay his notes in full. This correctly defines the rights of the parties during the whole of the period between the completed assignment of the notes and the maker's default in paying the note first due. We do not think the maker's default could change the rights of the assignees as between themselves, and divest the right of Bennett to priority of payment out of the property pledged. The legal presumption is that contracts will be performed, not violated. Bennett will be presumed to have purchased his notes, and paid more for them than he otherwise would have done, because of the priority which he would obtain. The appellant may be presumed to have purchased her notes and paid less for them on account of that priority. Under such presumption, it would be inequitable to hold that the maker's default, over which Bennett had no control, destroyed the priority, and placed all the notes on an equality, thus substituting pro rata for pro tanto rights. The appellant's contention that if the parties agree upon a contingency upon which a debt shall become due, then, when the event happens, the debt is due, is recognized law, but the rule cannot be carried to the extent of defeating the vested rights of the parties. The priority of payment is fixed and governed by the notes themselves, upon their face, and not by a contingency. This precise question is considered and determined in the case of Leavitt v. Reynolds, by the supreme court of Iowa. It was decided February 5, 1890, and will be found in 79 Iowa, 348, 7 L. R. A. 365. The same doctrine is adhered to in Humphreys v. Morton, 100 Ill. 593; Koester v. Burke, 81 Ill. 436. The case of People's Sav. Bank of Evansville v. Finney, 63 Ind. 460, settles the principle as stated by us, and Doss v. Dilmare, 70 Ind. 451, disposes of the case.

Appellant's suggestion that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding of the court was presented by assignment of error and argument on the original hearing. The allegations of the complaint with respect to the rights of the appellee Bennett in the notes in suit are "that since the execution of the notes and mortgage described said five notes, marked Exhibits 'A,' 'B,' 'C,' 'D,' and 'E,' had been sold, transferred, and indorsed to plaintiff, who is now the owner thereof." The evidence offered and appearing in the record of the case is a blank indorsement of each of the notes, "B. F. Landis." Appellant insists that this was not only a failure of the evidence to sustain the finding of the court, but an absolute failure of proof upon a material issue in the case. There was no answer in general denial putting in issue the execution of the indorsements, and hence no issue tendered requiring Bennett to put the indorsements in evidence.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

Courtland BUCKMAN, Appl.,
v.
STATE of Florida, ex rel. Champlin H.
SPENCER.

(.....Fla.....)

- *1. The plea of non usurpavit is not a proper plea in a proceeding by information in the nature of a quo warranto on the relation of a private person upon the refusal of the attorney-general to institute the suit.
2. The circuit courts of this state have jurisdiction to inquire by informations in the nature of a quo warranto into the legality of the election of a person to the office of mayor of a city or town organized under the general laws of this state for the incorporation of such municipalities, and the city or town council has no power by any action it may take in reference to such an election to deprive the courts of their jurisdiction over such matters.
3. The right of trial by jury on issues purely of fact arising in proceedings by information in the nature of quo warranto is guaranteed by the third section of the bill of rights of our constitution, which provides that the right of trial by jury shall be secured to all and remain inviolate forever.

*Headnotes by MABRY, J.

NOTE.—Right to jury in quo warranto proceedings.

The practice has been almost universal to submit the questions of fact arising in quo warranto proceedings to a jury as will be seen by the authorities cited in the above case and those collected in the case of Reynolds v. State, 61 Ind. 392, but the cases in which the question of the right to such trial has been adjudicated are very few.

There are many early English cases decided before the passage of Statute 3 Geo. II., chap. 25, in which the aid of a jury was obtained in trying questions arising in quo warranto proceedings, but there seems to be no expression as to the right to have the questions submitted to the jury.

The early practice books are equally silent on the subject. After the passage of 3 Geo. II., chapter 25, which provides for a jury in such cases, decisions may be found to the effect that such questions must be submitted to a jury, but even then it is not stated whether such ruling is based upon the statute or upon prior existing law or practice.

In Nevill v. Payne, 1 Cro. Eliz. 304, 35 & 36 Eliz., a jury trial was had.

In a case decided in 10 Geo. I., where the right to the office depended on the qualification of the electors, the court made the rule absolute, on the ground that being a matter of right it was fit to be tried by a jury, they being the proper judges of evidence. King v. Whitchurch, 8 Mod. 210.

In a case decided in 1781, 5 Geo. II., a rule was granted to show cause why an information in the nature of quo warranto should not go against defendant for exercising the office of capital Burgess of the town of New Radnor, and his counsel asked the court to determine the point on the rule for showing cause and not put defendant to the expense of a special verdict, but the court made the rule absolute, thinking this a matter fit to be determined by a jury.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Volusia County in favor of relator in a proceeding brought to try defendant's title to the office of mayor of the Town of Daytona. Reversed.

On July 24, 1889, an election was held for corporate officers in the town of Dayton, including the mayor. The candidates for mayoralty were Courtland Buckman and Chaplin H. Spencer. Buckman was declared elected, took the oath of office and was duly installed as mayor. Spencer instituted proceedings in the nature of quo warranto, charging Buckman with usurpation of the office and claimed that Spencer was entitled thereto. Motions to quash and various demurrers were overruled, and defendant pleaded to the information non usurpavit and a special plea to the merits; further that the town council by its proceedings had rendered the matter res judicata. The plea of non usurpavit was stricken out, together with all others, except the special plea as to the facts. Issue was joined on this plea, and a jury demanded. The court refused a jury and referred the case to a master who made a report upon which judgment of ouster was entered.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. H. H. Buckman, for appellant:

The plea of not guilty was a good plea and should have been allowed. The proceeding was on the private relation of relator, the state was no party and was not making the inquiry, made in a more solemn way. King v. Pool, 3 Barnard. 38.

In King v. Clarke, 1 East, 38, the court said: "The question is put too much in dubio by the affidavits by either side for the court to say that it is not proper to be inquired into by a jury." And similar remarks were made in King v. Bingham, 3 East, 303.

In King v. Bridge, 1 W. Bl. 40, 23 Geo. II., it is said that the case must be tried by jury.

In King v. Harwood, 2 East, 177, it was admitted by defendant that the merits of the election must be submitted to a jury.

The present English practice under the crown office rules is stated by Shortt on Mandamus, p. 158, to be that either party may obtain a trial with a jury on application for it, otherwise the mode of trial will be by a judge without a jury. But the court may at any time order the trial to be before a jury.

In this country the courts which have passed upon the question have not agreed as to whether the right to a jury was a common-law right which was preserved by the constitutions. A very few of the states are in the same condition as Florida in which all statutes passed in England prior to July 4, 1776, are in force. See note to McKennon v. Wins, 22 L. R. A. 503. Of course in such states there can be no question because it is settled by the Statute of 3 Geo. II., chap. 25.

In State v. Johnson, 26 Ark. 231, the supreme court of Arkansas determines that there is no right of trial by jury, basing its ruling principally upon the fact that jurisdiction was given to the supreme court, and that no provision was made for a jury in that case, although a part of the argument is to the effect that the Statute of 3 Geo. II., chap. 25, gave a right to jury trial in quo warranto proceedings.

and the proceeding was narrowed down to a substitute for a civil suit between two claimants to a municipal office. While the state need show nothing, and may always call on respondent to show his title, so far as the private relator is concerned he has no such power, he must show title and if he fail he cannot have judgment, hence the rule as to the plea of non usurpavit does not apply, and it was a proper plea to relator's alleged claim.

State v. Kupferle, 44 Mo. 154, 100 Am. Dec. 265; Wood, Mandamus, 234.

The relator is bound to show his title and has the affirmative.

The party in possession is presumed regularly elected and the burden of proof is on the relator and he is bound to show he is entitled and the defendant not.

The refusal of the court to grant a trial by jury and his making the order and referring said cause to a master, over the objection of defendant, made all the proceedings and judgment irregular and they must be reversed.

ings, from which the conclusion is drawn that prior to that time no such right existed.

So under the Minnesota constitution, which gives the right to trial by jury in actions at law, and gives the supreme court jurisdiction of certain remedial cases, but provides that there shall be no trial by jury in said court, it is held that the remedial cases embrace quo warranto, and that therefore a jury trial is not demandable as of right in such cases. State v. Minnesota Thresher Mfg. Co. 3 L. R. A. 510, 40 Minn. 213.

So in Missouri it is said that a constitutional provision that the right of trial by jury should remain inviolate cannot be understood to require the supreme court to summon juries in quo warranto proceedings. State v. Vail, 53 Mo. 97.

And in that state it is settled that there is no constitutional right to trial by jury in such cases. State v. Lupton, 64 Mo. 415, 27 Am. Rep. 253.

So under the Arkansas Usurpation of Office Act, which was enacted in lieu of proceedings by scire facias and quo warranto there is no constitutional right to trial by jury. Wheat v. Smith, 50 Ark. 265.

If there is no dispute as to the facts, there can be no jury trial. Lee v. State, 49 Ala. 43.

So in People v. Cook, 8 N. Y. 67, 59 Am. Dec. 451, the action of the trial court in withdrawing the case from the jury was approved on the ground that the evidence did not make such a case as should go to the jury.

But in State v. Burnett, 2 Ala. 140, it is said, when the relation is made at the instance of one claiming a disputed office or franchise, if a prima facie case is made by his affidavit, he is entitled to be placed in a proper condition to assert his rights in due course of law, and to have all disputed facts determined by a jury.

And in People v. Doesburg, 16 Mich. 133, the supreme court sent an issue of fact down to be tried at circuit, and upon the trial court's refusing a jury, 24 L. R. A.

The proceeding was a common-law proceeding.

As such the right of trial by jury is a constitutional right and cannot be taken away.

Const. 1887, Declaration of Rights, § 8; Wint River S. B. Co. v. Roberts, 2 Fla. 102, 43 Am. Dec. 186.

The right of a trial by jury in proceedings by information in the nature of quo warranto existed at common law even under the ancient writ, and from the earliest times to the present day it has been conceded, until it has become part of the body of the law, that all issues of fact in such proceedings are triable by jury.

See King v. Jones, 8 Mod. 201; King v. Penryn, 8 Mod. 216; King v. Whitechurch, 8 Mod. 210; King v. Bingham, 2 East, 808; King v. Clarke, 1 East, 38; King v. Francis, 2 T. R. 484.

the supreme court intimated that the trial by jury was a matter of right and sent the case back for a new trial.

In State v. Allen, 5 Kan. 213, the court says that at common law in quo warranto proceeding the respondent was probably entitled to a jury for the trial of questions of fact.

In People v. Albany & S. R. Co. 57 N. Y. 161, the action was against the directors of a private corporation, and the court said there was before the court in the pleadings a legal question in respect to the title to the corporate office of directors in the railroad company. To the trial of that question only the people and the two sets of directors were proper parties. This issue being strictly a legal issue in its character is one in the trial of which, in the language of the constitution, the trial by jury has been heretofore used. Such a trial was, therefore, the constitutional right of the parties. S. C. 5 Lana. 85.

In Com. v. Delaware & H. Canal Co., 43 Pa. 235, it was said that it was a matter of no importance to the parties whether the authority granted to the court by the quo warranto acts was exercised in the common law or in the equity form, provided the right of trial by jury is not interfered with.

There is a right to trial by jury under the Indiana statutes. Reynolds v. State, 61 Ind. 302.

In State v. Messmore, 14 Wis. 115, a jury was called to try the issues of facts in the supreme court, and there are several other cases in which a similar practice obtained. But such cases are not valuable in settling the question of right, because it is readily conceivable that in many cases the court would desire to be relieved of the necessity of deciding questions of fact and seek the aid of a jury for that purpose not because it rewarded such proceeding as demandable of right but because it was a matter of convenience. Messrs. Hamlin & Stewart for appellee.

Mabry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An information in the nature of a quo warranto was filed in the circuit court for Volusia county in the name of the state of Florida, on the relation of appellee, upon her refusal of the attorney-general to institute the proceeding on such relation, for the purpose of testing the right of appellant to hold the office of mayor of the town of Daytona, in this state. The information alleges, among other things, in substance, that appellee and appellant were the only candidates for said office at a regular election of municipal officers for said town held on the 24th day of July, A. D. 1889, and that appellee was duly elected by a majority of the electors of said municipality as mayor, but that the judges and inspectors of said election, or a majority of them, fraudulently canvassed the votes cast and wrongfully declared appellant elected, and that he took the oath of office, and was then wrongfully exercising the franchises thereof.

The proceedings in the circuit court terminated in a judgment that appellant be ousted from the office of mayor of said town, and that appellee be inducted therein.

The pleadings in this case are similar in many respects to those in the case of State v. Anderson, 26 Fla. 240, both cases growing out of the same election. The respondent in the circuit court, appellant here, filed a motion to quash, and also demurred to the information, and both being overruled, pleas were filed, to which a demurrer was sustained. The pleas were amended, and upon the issues of fact made on them the trial was had that resulted in the judgment mentioned.

The first two errors assigned are the rulings of the court on the motion to quash, and the demurrer to the information. In reference to these assignments of error counsel for appellant says: "But as the court has virtually passed on the matter raised by them lately in a similar proceeding, these two grounds of error are therefore not now urged, except as such matters differ from the case referred to, and are hereafter specially set up." It is then urged, first, that the court erred in overruling the plea of non usurpavit which was filed by respondent. The contention under this head being that while such a plea would not be good as against the people, where the attorney-general institutes the proceedings, the same rule does not obtain when a private individual comes in on his own relation upon the refusal of such officer to commence the suit. This point was settled in the case mentioned, State v. Anderson. Where the suit is instituted on the relation of a private individual, and a prima facie right to the office is shown, the respondent must show by what right he holds. The relator having shown a right to contest for the office, and to call upon the respondent to show by what authority, quo warranto, he exercises the functions thereof, and an issue being made up to try such right between the parties, the fact that the relator may be found not entitled to the office will not authorize the respondent to hold it unless he is entitled to it. Upon such an issue the statute provides that no person shall be adjudged entitled to hold the office then in question except upon full proof of his title to it. As decided in the case referred to, the plea of non usurpavit by the respondent is not proper, and the court did not err in overruling it.

It is further insisted under the assignments of error mentioned that the court erred in overruling respondent's third original plea. It is not necessary to set out all the allegations of this plea, as the only objections to it urged here may be clearly stated without such recital. The information alleges that the town of Daytona was a municipal corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the state of Florida, and was such corporation on the day of the election therein mentioned; and that said election was ordered and held in pursuance of an ordinance duly passed by said municipality in May, 1884; and that the provisions of another ordinance passed by said town on the 22d day of July, 1889, two days before said election was held, were enforced by the inspectors of the election up to the closing of the polls. In the second plea to the information it is alleged that the ordinance of the 22d of July, 1889, was inoperative at the date of the election because it was passed two days prior thereto, and had not then been properly promulgated. The third plea sets out the provision of the ordinance passed in 1884, prescribing that the inspectors of elections in said town shall proceed substantially as the state laws shall direct, and after reciting what was the state regulation as to the ballot to be used at a general election, it is further alleged that said election was held in pursuance of the act under which said town was incorporated, the said ordinance passed in 1884, and the said state regulation as to the ballot to be used. Also that on final canvass of the votes cast at said election by the inspectors, respondent was found by them to be duly and legally elected to the office of mayor of said town, giving the votes cast for both parties, and upon the completion of said canvass the inspectors duly certified the result of the election to the mayor of said town, who, with the aldermen thereof, in regular session assembled for that purpose, and in the presence of relator, who made no protest or objection thereto, received the returns of said election, and by resolution adopted the same as the only valid result of said election. It is also alleged that the respondent then took the oath of office as said mayor, and was lawfully exercising the functions thereof.

It will be seen by an examination of the case already referred to (State v. Anderson), that the validity of the ordinance passed on the 22d day of July, 1899, so far as shown by the record, was passed upon and held to be valid. The ordinance took effect from the date of its passage and approval.

The points argued by counsel under the third plea are "that the matter was res judicata, having been acted upon by the council, a body empowered by the statute to judge of the qualifications and election returns of its own members," and that the plea set up a full defense to the relator's claims for the reason, according to the authorities cited on this point, that the jurisdiction over such matters is vested exclusively in the town council. The fact that relator was present when the return of the inspectors was received by the council, and made no protest thereto, was not sufficient to estop him from resorting to the courts for the redress of such rights growing out of the election as he may have had. In reference to the grant of power by the general law incorporating cities and towns in this state to the council to judge of the election returns and qualifications of its own members having the effect to deprive the courts of jurisdiction over such matters, it is said in State v. Anderson that "the better authority, as we think, and it seems, the weight of it, is against the proposition that the above grant to the council ousts, of itself, the jurisdiction of this court to inquire, upon information in the nature of quo warranto, into the defendant's title." But we fail to find any grant at all to the council to judge of the election of the mayor, or to entertain any contest over the title to this office. It may be that the legislature can confer such exclusive authority on the town council to pass upon the election and qualifications of the mayor as to deprive the courts of jurisdiction over the same; but no such power had been conferred upon the town council of Daytona at the time of the election, and relator had a right to resort to the court to have his right to the office determined.

What is here said covers the objections urged to the rulings of the court on the pleadings, and we find no errors so far as the objections urged extend.

A demurrer was overruled to the amended pleas filed, and upon issues tendered thereon the defendant demanded a trial by jury. This was refused, and the court appointed a master to take testimony; upon the report of the master the court proceeded to adjudicate the cause. The defendant excepted to the rulings of the court denying the trial by jury, and also to the proceedings before the master, and they are assigned as error. The ruling of the court on the demurrer to the amended pleas, it may be stated, is not before us for review, and we will not stop to discuss it, though we entertain some doubt about the legal sufficiency of the pleas on demurrer. Accepting the issues of fact, as was done by the court, tendered on the pleas, we proceed to consider the errors assigned.

These assignments of error present the question whether a defendant is entitled to a jury trial on questions of fact in a proceeding by information in the nature of a quo warranto. This right is claimed under the guarantee of the constitution. The present constitution provides that "the right of trial by jury shall be secured to all, and remain inviolate forever." The first constitution, framed in 1838 for our state government, provided that "the right of trial by jury shall forever remain inviolate." These provisions, it is evident, were not designed to grant or create the right of trial by jury, but they were framed for the purpose of guaranteeing such a right already existing. It has been said that a constitution is not the beginning of government, and is adopted in harmony with existing conditions of things. The following is the language of Judge Cooley, quoted by us in the case of English v. State, 31 Fla. 340: "It is also a very reasonable rule that a state constitution shall be understood and construed in the light and by the assistance of the common law, and with the fact in view that its rules are still left in force. By this we do not mean that the common law is to control the constitution, or that the latter is to be warped and perverted in its meaning in order that no inroads, or as few as possible, may be made in the system of common-law rules, but only that for definitions we are to draw from that great fountain, and that in judging what it means, we are to keep in mind that it is not the beginning of law for the state, but that it assumes the existence of a well-understood system which is still to remain in force and be administered, but under such limitations and restrictions as that instrument imposes.

Donald v. State, 31 Fla. 255. Judge Douglas said for this court in Flint River S. B. Co. v. Roberts, 2 Fla. 103, 48 Am. Dec. 186, in speaking of the right of trial by jury that "it has always been an object of deep interest and solicitude, and every encroachment upon it has been watched with great jealousy. 8 Story, Com. 638, 639, § 1760. In Magna Charta it is more than once insisted on, as the principal bulwark of our liberties, but especially in chapter 29, by which it is provided: 'That no freeman shall be hurt, in either his person or property (nisi per legale iudicium parium suorum vel per legem terre), unless by lawful judgment of his peers or equals, or by the law of the land. . . . Chapter 29 of Magna Charta is in force in this state by virtue of the Act of November 6, 1820, adopting the common law and statute laws of England."

When the right of trial by jury is secured by constitutional provision in general terms like ours, and without any qualification or restriction, it must be understood as retained in all those cases that were triable by jury according to the course of the common law. The provision in the first constitution, framed in 1838, "that the right of trial by jury shall forever remain inviolate," contemplated, without doubt, a continuation of jury trials in all cases where such was the practice at the common law, and there is nothing in the subsequent constitutions to indicate a change of meaning in this respect. It will be remembered that in 1829, prior to the formation of the Constitution in 1838, the legislature had expressly adopted the common law of England as in force in the territory of Florida. But it was never understood that the right of trial by jury secured by such a constitutional provision, extended to all cases, as there were many trials and proceedings according to the course of the common law, in which juries did not participate.

The old common-law writ of quo warranto was a prerogative writ, to be applied for on behalf of the crown as a matter of right, as against one who had usurped franchises or liberties and for the purpose of inquiring by what right he claimed to do so. It was clearly a civil remedy at law, and the process to bring the party into court was a summons. In process of time the old writ became superseded in great measure by the proceeding by information in the nature of quo warranto. This writ, in its origin, was criminal in its nature designed not only to oust the usurper of the franchise claimed by him, but to punish him by fine for such usurpation. The question of the right to exercise the franchise was, however, involved in the prosecution. This writ at first, like the old one, could only be prosecuted on behalf of the crown, and at the present it must be in the name of the crown, and with us in the name of the state.

The Statute of 9 Anne made some changes as to the mode of instituting this writ, confined probably exclusively to municipal offices, and certain crown officers were permitted by that statute, by leave of the court first obtained, to institute the suit in the name of the crown on the relation of parties claiming a right to the office. This statute extended, to some extent, the writ so as to permit under the conditions prescribed a contest in reality between private individuals to the office in question. It was very much debated for quite a while whether the information in the nature of quo warranto was strictly a criminal prosecution or a civil suit. It is clear, however, that for some time before the revolution the writ was regarded in England, though criminal in form, as a civil proceeding to test the right of a party to exercise a franchise, and of ousting a wrongful possessor. It has always been considered as a civil remedy at law by the great majority of the American courts, and our own court has so regarded it. State v. Gleason, 12 Fla. 190; State v. Saxon, 25 Fla. 342; State v. Anderson, supra; Ames v. Kansas, 111 U. S. 449, 28 L. ed. 492; note to case of People v. Richardson, 4 Cow. 97.

The question, whether or not the issues purely of fact made upon the pleadings in information in the nature of quo warranto were triable by jury at the common law, has given rise to some diversity of opinion in some of the American courts. In the present investigation we are confined to the proceedings by information in the nature of quo warranto which, in its origin, was undoubtedly criminal in nature as well as purpose in part. Our examination into the matter has conducted us to the conclusion that at the time of the revolution the trial of pure questions of fact in such proceedings was by jury. It is stated in 5 Bacon's Abridgment, page 188, under the head of informations, that "as an information of this kind (quo warranto) is now considered rather as a civil proceeding, a new trial may be granted as well where there has been a verdict in favor of the defendant, as where it has been given in favor of the crown." Again on page 187, "where the defendant sets forth a bad title to the office, and confesses the user, that amounts to a confession of the usurpation, and if an immaterial issue is joined, and a verdict found on which the court cannot give judgment, yet they will not grant a repleader, but will give judgment on the plea." In the following English decisions in such cases trials by jury on the issues of fact were had, viz.: Rez v. Bennett, 1 Strange, 101; Rez v. Bell, 2 Strange, 995; Nevill v. Payne, 1 Cro. Eliz. 304; Rez v. Francis, 2 T. R. 484; Rez v. Philips, 1 Burr. 293; King v. Carpenter, 2 Show. 47; Rez v. Malden, 4 Burr. 2135; King v. Bridge, 1 W. Bl. 46.

In Rez v. Bennett all the judges of England were equally divided, the division being equal in each court, over the question whether a new trial could be granted after a verdict in favor of the defendant in such proceeding. The view that the suit was criminal then widely prevailed, but this point was finally settled in favor of the view above announced, that the action, though criminal in form, was regarded as a civil suit for the purpose of trying the right to the franchise. It seems also that a bill of exceptions was allowed in such proceedings. Bacon, Abr., supra. And in People v. Sackett, 14 Mich. 243, it was held that the appellate court would not review the proceedings on the trial of issues of fact in such cases by a jury in the circuit court without the judge's report of the proceedings, rulings, and evidence before him.

Angell & Ames on Corporations state (§ 741), "that if a prima facie case of usurpation is made out, and there appears a fair doubt on the title of the defendant, the court will not discuss the question in the summary way of motion, but send the facts to a jury." Several English cases are referred to in which the court thought proper to send the question to a jury, or leave the parties to bring the matter more solemnly before the court on demurrer. In a great many of the American courts, and we think a clear majority of them, parties have a right to have the jury pass upon purely questions of fact in such proceedings. We refer to some of them: People v. Albany & S. R. Co. 57 N. Y. 161; People v. Doesbury, 16 Mich. 133;

Harbaugh v. People, 88 Mich. 241; State v. Norton, 46 Wis. 332; State v. Burnett, 2 Ala. 140; Lee v. State, 49 Ala. 48; Com. v. Woolper, 8 Serg. & R. 29, 8 Am. Dec. 628; Com. v. Smith, 45 Pa. 59; State v. Funck, 17 Iowa, 365; State v. Norwalk & D. Turnp. Co. 10 Conn. 157.

In People v. Oicott, 15 Mich. 326, a question arose in the supreme court on issues of fact made there as to the county to which they should be sent for trial by jury, and it was held that in such cases, "the statute being silent as to the place of trial of issues of fact involved therein, the supreme court will not send any such case for trial to a court other than that where the election took place, without the same showing as would authorize a change of venue." The supreme court of Wisconsin in the case of State v. Mesemore, 14 Wis. 115, ordered a trial by jury in that court on issues of fact raised in such a proceeding on the ground that it was a case of public interest and importance, and should be then determined. That court, as we understand it, exercises its own discretion whether trials by jury shall be had there on issues of fact in such proceedings, or be sent to a trial court for such purpose. In King v. Amery, 1 T. R. 363, it was held that upon an application for a trial at bar, the court will in every case exercise its own discretion upon the peculiar circumstances of the case, and where a fair trial cannot be had in the county where the matter arises, the trial will be awarded in the next English county where the king's writ of venue runs. The case of State v. Foster, 32 Kan. 14, presents a complete trial by jury on issues of fact before the supreme court in an information in the nature of quo warranto. The right of trial by jury on such issues was demanded and accorded by the court, though it is stated to have been done ex gratia. Vide Paine on Elections, § 908, where it is stated, "the weight of authority is in favor of the proposition that, at the common law, an information in the nature of a quo warranto was triable by jury;" Reynolds v. State, 61 Ind. 392; Wood, Mandamus & Quo Warranto, p. 284; High, Extr. Legal Rem. §§ 740, 741. There are some authorities to the contrary: State v. Vail, 53 Mo. 97; State v. Lupton, 64 Mo. 415, 27 Am. Rep. 253; State v. Johnson, 26 Ark. 281. In the first and last of the cases just mentioned applications for jury trials on issues of fact were made in the supreme courts and refused. In the last case mentioned the proceeding was by quo warranto. In this case it is said that "in the proceeding by information in the nature of quo warranto it was expressly provided by an act of parliament (8 Geo. II., chap. 25), that a jury shall be struck before a proper officer on demand of the king or the respondent," and it is argued from this fact that no such right existed at the common law, as the statute would have been useless if it did. We have not been able to find the Statute of Geo. II., referred to in the opinion, and cannot say whether or not it was declaratory of the common law on the subject, but from the date given, it would be old enough to become law here by virtue of the Act of 1839, adopted 24 L. R. A.

ing the common law and English statutes in force prior to and down to 1776.

In State v. Suwannee County Comrs., 21 Fla. 1, an original proceeding by mandamus in this court, it was held that a jury trial could not be demanded here. The view expressed was that the constitution conferred the jurisdiction on this court in such cases, and the proceeding was at common law, and according to this proceeding there was no jury trial, as the return was conclusive. Under the Statute of 9 Anne issues of fact were permitted to be made on the return and trial had thereon, but as there was no statute requiring or authorizing such issues to be tried by jury in this court, the proceeding should be as it was at common law without a jury. In State v. Vail, supra, it was decided that the supreme court had jurisdiction in such cases, but it would generally decline to investigate them when other courts had been provided for their adjudication, and possessing the same powers as the appellate court over such matters subject to appeal, and having more facilities for the trial of such issues.

The Statute of Anne in reference to permitting informations in the nature of quo warranto to be filed on the relation of private persons provides that such actions shall proceed in such manner as usual in cases of information in the nature of quo warranto. The proceedings in the case before us were instituted in the circuit court, and we are to determine whether or not such issues of fact are triable by jury in that court, and not in the appellate court. As before stated, our conclusion is, that in informations in the nature of quo warranto the right to have issues of fact determined by a jury existed at the common law, and that such right existed down to the time of the revolution. There is nothing in the terms of the Act of 1872 (chap. 1874) that will prevent a construction in harmony with such right as it existed at common law, and as such secured by the constitutional provisions to which we have referred.

It may be well to say that we are not dealing with a statutory regulation as to the contest of the election of a mayor of a town or city. It was decided in State v. Anderson, supra, that the grant of power to the council to judge of the election returns and qualifications of its own members did not deprive the courts of jurisdiction by the remedy of information in the nature of quo warranto. Rights asserted by such remedy are controlled by common-law principles, and not by statutory regulations providing exclusive modes for settling contests over municipal offices. State v. Lewis, 51 Conn. 118.

The issues raised on the pleas filed in the case under consideration presented questions purely of fact, and we think the court erred in refusing to submit them to the consideration of the jury.

The denial of this right, it will not be questioned, is good ground for a reversal of the judgment appealed from, and an order will be entered reversing the judgment and remanding the cause to the Circuit Court.

v.

A. G. COOKSEY.

(33 Fla. 715.)

- *1. The relation of landlord and tenant existed between the parties appellant and appellee, as shown by the record in this case.
2. The constitutional exemption of personal property to the head of a family residing in this state cannot be claimed by a tenant as against the lien for rent in favor of the landlord on any of the agricultural products raised on the land rented. The land in such a case is regarded as such a factor in the production of the crops as to subordinate the title of the tenant thereto to the superior lien given by statute for the use of the premises.
3. The statutory remedy for the enforcement of a claim for rent is embraced within the terms "any process

*Headnotes by MARRY, J.

NOTE.—Availability of exemptions against claim for rent.

Statutory lien for rent.

Where the landlord is given a lien by statute paramount to the tenant's claim of exemption, the landlord's lien will prevail. Cathart v. Turner, 18 Fla. 337; Slaughter v. Winfrey, 35 N. C. 159; Durham v. Speake, 32 N. C. 57; Prince v. Nance, 7 S. C. N. S. 351; Bryan v. Kelley, 35 Ala. 539.

And in such a case the lien is not lost by the landlord taking a note from the tenant in which note the exemption is waived. Stephens v. Adams, 38 Ala. 117.

So leasing a storeroom after a statute was passed which statute gave landlords a lien for rent, makes the statute a part of the contract of lease and waives the exemption as to such lien. Ex parte Barnes, 34 Ala. 540.

But a landlord has no lien against the property of his tenant that is exempt, where there is no statute creating such lien. Abraham v. Davenport, 73 Iowa, 111; Mason v. O'Brien, 42 Miss. 420.

But see "Equitable Lien," infra.

And under Ky. Gen Stat., chap. 55, art. 6, § 5, providing that property exempt from execution is exempt from distress or attachment for rent, but not for money or property furnished, the property of a subtenant is also exempt notwithstanding chapter 66, article 2, section 13, gives the landlord a lien on the property of the tenant or under tenant. Rudd v. Ford, 91 Ky. 183.

And in Livingstone v. Wright, 68 Tex. 706, and Marshall v. Pitman, Id. 624, it was stated that the landlord has a lien on the property of the tenant not exempt from forced sale situated in the house rented.

The case of HODGES v. COOKSEY holds that the constitutional provision exempting one thousand dollars worth of property does not apply where the statute gives a landlord a lien on products raised on the land, but does apply to other property. This distinction made on the ground that the land is a factor in producing the crops does not seem to have been discussed in other cases. Although in Georgia the landlord was allowed an equitable lien on that ground against an exemption claim of the tenant. See subhead "Equitable Lien."

Waiver of exemption.

A pledge of property to be acquired in the future will not give a landlord a lien as against the widow 24 L. R. A.

of law," contained in the exemption article of the Constitution of 1868, and the personal property exemption secured by that instrument, other than agricultural products raised on the land rented, may be claimed by the head of a family residing in this state, as against the lien for rent given by statute, in favor of the landlord.

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the A Circuit Court for Bradford County in favor of complainant in a proceeding to enjoin the sale of certain property which had been levied upon under a distraint warrant for rent on the ground that it was exempt. Affirmed.

Cooksey bought for a term of years, or leased, from Mary E. Hodges a piece of property on which was a mineral spring and a good stand for a country store. Cooksey owned a saw-mill, and his scheme was to operate the mill, improve the spring for the accommodation of summer visitors, and sell goods. He undertook to pay a rent of $500 per annum.

ow's claim of exemption. Vinson v. Hollowell, 12 Bush, 538.

So where the lease gives the landlord a lien but was not specific as to the property on which exemption was waived, it was construed to give a lien only on nonexempt property. Selling v. Gunderman, 35 Tex. 544.

And in Wilder v. Stewart, 21 N. Y. Week. Dig. 93, it was stated that a householder could not by an executory agreement estop himself in a lease from his right to claim the exemption. But in that case the landlord united his claim for rent with other claims and took judgment thereon, and the exemption then applied.

And under Iowa Code, § 2017, providing for a landlord's lien on non-exempt property, where a lien is given in the lease, it is in the nature of a chattel mortgage and must be recorded. Sioux Valley State Bank v. Honnold, 35 Iowa, 352.

See note to Dickey v. Waldo (Mich.), 23 L. R. A. 449, as to sale or mortgage of future crops.

But a lease constituting the rent a lien on the crop and stock on the premises "whether exempt from execution or not" is a valid mortgage of exempt property. Fejavary v. Broesch, 32 Iowa, 32 35 Am. Rep. 261.

This case does not show whether the lease was recorded or not.

And under Kansas Comp. Laws 1879, chap. 55, § 20, a tenant may waive in writing the benefit of the exemption laws for debts contracted for rent. Holington v. Huff, 24 Kan. 379.

So a waiver of the "benefit of all laws or usages exempting any property from distress or execution for rent" waives the exemption. Beatty v. Rankin, 139 Pa. 368.

But in Mitchell v. Coates, 47 Pa. 202, it was held that a waiver of exemption in the lease from levy and sale "for arrears of rent" does not extend to a judgment note given thereafter in lieu thereof.

Equitable Lien.

In Georgia it has been held that a landlord has an equitable lien on the tenant's crops for the rent which is paramount to the claim of the tenant for exemption. Davis v. Meyers, 41 Ga. 95; Talliaferro v. Fry, 41 Ga. 622; Harrell v. Fagan, 43 Ga. 339.

In Talliaferro v. Fry, supra, there was a mortgage to secure the lien made by the tenant and one judge held that this would bind the tenant's wife without her signature. L. T.

Having failed to pay installments when due until there was nearly $1,500 due, the defendant levied a distrait warrant upon all his property, including crops of himself and his tenant and some goods belonging to his son. Cooksey then instituted this proceeding to enjoin the sale of the property on the ground that it was exempt from execution to him as the head of a family.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. King & King for appellant.

Mr. Thomas E. Bugg, for appellee:

An exemption of personal property from forced sale under legal process, to the amount of $1,000 in value, may be claimed under the constitution, by a tenant entitled to claim exemption when his property is levied upon for the satisfaction of a claim for rent or supplies furnished by the landlord; but such exemption cannot be claimed out of the products of the land rented, when an express lien exists under the statute.

Cathcart v. Turner, 18 Fla. 837.

The distress warrant in this cause was sued out in October, 1889, and the rent distrained for accrued prior to the year 1889. By chapter 8247 Laws of Florida, Pamphlet Acts of the Legislature, 1881, page 64, it is provided that distress for rent can only be made on crops grown during the current year of the accrual of the rent for which distress is made.

Mr. L. B. Rhodes also for appellee.

Mabry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee filed a bill in chancery against appellant and the sheriff of Bradford county to enjoin the sale of personal property levied on by virtue of a distress warrant to collect rent alleged to be due appellant. The injunction prayed for in the bill was granted, to continue in force until the further order of the court, and after answer filed a motion was made to dissolve the injunction on bill and answer. The motion to dissolve the injunction was overruled, and from this ruling the respondent, Mary E. Hodges, appealed.

The bill contains many allegations of matters of which a court of chancery has no jurisdiction, and we do not deem it necessary to set them out in this opinion. As no objection was made to the sufficiency of the pleadings, we will consider no allegation therein except these relating to appellee's right of exemption in and to the property seized under the distress proceedings. The theory of the bill is that the complainant appellee here, is entitled to the constitutional exemption of $1,000 worth of personal property out of the property seized under the distress warrant. Chapter 8246, Laws of 1881, confers upon the circuit courts "equity jurisdiction to enjoin the sale of all property, real and personal, that is exempt from forced sale under the constitution and laws of the state of Florida," and such matters in the case before us as relate to the claim and right of appellee to hold as exempt from such forced sale the property, or any part of it, levied on by the sheriff, come properly within the jurisdiction of the court of chancery.

The relation between appellant and appellee, as shown by the written contract between them, a copy of which is attached to the bill and not questioned by the answer, was, we think, that of landlord and tenant. The lease of the premises therein described was for five years, beginning on the first day of January, 1885, at a yearly rental of six hundred dollars, evidenced by five promissory notes, due respectively January 1, 1886, January 1, 1887, January 1, 1888, January 1, 1889, and January 1, 1890, and the claim for rent alleged to be due under this lease on the 10th day of October, 1889, when the distress warrant was issued, was $1,446.22. The property levied on under the warrant consisted of horses, mules, cattle, hogs, wagons, cart, buggy and harness, farming implements, corn, fodder and cotton, gathered and ungathered, a steam saw-mill and machinery attached, a grist-mill, cotton gins and a cotton press, a lot of sawed lumber and a stock of merchandise consisting of dry goods, groceries, and medicines. All of the property levied upon was found on the leased premises except about thirty-three head of cattle, one wagon and one cart, and this part of the property was found on another place. Appellee was the head of a family residing in this state, and claims that he is entitled to hold one thousand dollars' worth of the property levied on exempt from sale under the distress proceedings, and this is the only question we need consider in determining the correctness of the court's ruling in refusing to dissolve the injunction.

Claims for rent under section 1, chapter 8181, Acts of 1879, are declared to be a lien on all agricultural products raised on the land rented superior to all other liens and claims though of older date, and also a lien on all other property of the lessee or his sub-lessee or assigns usually kept on the premises superior to any lien acquired subsequent to such property having been brought on the premises leased. The distress warrant may be levied on any property of the tenant liable for the rent whether it be found on or off the leased premises, and in whosoever possession found, but the lien of the warrant on property not mentioned in the first section of said act dates from the day upon which the levy is made. Chapter 8247, Acts of 1881, gave the landlord a lien on the crops grown on the rented land for rent for the current year, and also for advances made for the sustenance or well-being of the tenant or his family, for preparing the ground for cultivation, or for cultivating, gathering, saving, handling, or preparing the crop for market. This act gave a further lien on articles advanced and on property purchased with money advanced, which need not be considered in this case. We regard it as settled in this state that the constitutional exemption of personal property cannot be claimed as against the lien for rent on the agricultural products raised on the land rented. Cathcart v. Turner, 18 Fla. 837; Blanchard v. Raines, 20 Fla. 467. There are many decisions sustaining the view taken by this court in the cases mentioned. The land rented is regarded as such a factor in the production of the crops as to subordinate the title of the tenant thereto to the superior or paramount lien for the use and occupation of the land. As expressed in Cathcart v. Turner: "As to such products there can be no claim of exemption, because the very title of the tenant to such products is subordinate to the lien." Slaughter v. Winfrey, 85 N. C. 159. The lien given by the Act of 1879, supra, is on the agricultural products raised on the land rented, and no reference is made to the crop of any year during the lease being bound only for the rent of that year. By this act the lien for rent is a charge as between landlord and tenant upon any of the agricultural products raised on the rented premises during the pendency of the lease. Whether the lien for rent on the other property of the tenant usually kept on the premises, and found either on or off the same, is superior to the claim of exemption from forced sale under the constitution, presents another question. In the absence of any right to the exemption provided for in the constitution, it is entirely clear that the Act of 1879 gives a lien on all the property other than agricultural products of the lessee or his sub-lessee or assigns usually kept on the premises superior to liens acquired subsequent to the carrying of such property on the premises leased. Jones v. Fox, 23 Fla. 454; Fox v. Jones, 26 Fla. 276.

It is contended by counsel for appellee that the right to claim the constitutional exemption as against a demand for rent has been decided by this court in the case of Cathcart v. Turner. A careful examination of that case will show that it cannot be regarded as a direct adjudication of the point. It is true that in that case the distress warrant was levied upon agricultural products, and also on some "household goods," and as to the household goods the opinion says that the claimant, "if he is entitled to claim the benefit of any exemption of property 'from forced sale on any process of law' he can lawfully claim them as exempt from distraint for rent or any other process of law under the terms of section 1, article 9, of the Constitution, to the value, if not more, of one thousand dollars." The statement of the case shows that Cathcart, the landlord, had a special contract for rent by which all the crops grown on the place were to be appropriated to the payment of the rent and for supplies furnished, and that none of the crops were to be sold by the tenant until the rents and supplies were paid for. This contract is referred to in one place in the opinion as being a paper mortgaging the crops to pay the rent. As we understand the facts of that case the landlord had taken a specific lien by contract on the agricultural products alone to secure his rent and supplies, and that he was insisting on that lien in his bill to enjoin the sheriff and the tenant from allowing a claim of exemptions. The further statement in reference to the household goods, that the sheriff should not be enjoined from allowing the debtor entitled to the exemption to select personal property within the constitutional limit as to value upon which the lien did not exist, indicates that such goods in the case then before the court were regarded as not being subject to the lien relied upon in the bill. Counsel for appellant insist that the case of Blanchard v. Raines, supra, is an authority against the right of the tenant to claim an exemption as against a demand for rent. We do not understand that the claim of exemption was presented in that case. An affidavit based upon a claim for rent and supplies furnished was made and the warrant issued thereon levied upon agricultural products and horses, and the question presented to the court arose on a motion to quash the distress warrant on the grounds that the affidavit was not sufficient, and that the writ was void because it was not made returnable on a rule day, and no service of it on any one was required. The principal point considered in the case is whether the procedure provided by the statute for the collection of rent by warrant of distress was in conflict with the constitutional provisions securing the right of trial by jury, and providing that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law. The common-law proceeding by warrant of distress is referred to and it is said that "our statute adopts the common-law right of distress for rent, but requires the landlord to make oath to the amount due. It has further provided that the landlord shall have a like lien upon crops for the price or value of supplies and advances made by him, or under his order, to the tenant, to enable him to make and harvest his crops. The contract of leasing is made under these conditions imposed by the statute, and of course the statute enters into and forms part of the contract, regulating and limiting the rights and duties of each party. This statute, as before remarked, makes the rent and advances a specific lien upon the property mentioned, and thereby the landlord has a right of property in the crops, etc., which he is by the act authorized to foreclose by seizure and sale in the manner prescribed." The court was speaking, it must be remembered, with reference to the necessity of notice and a trial by jury before the seizure of property under a distress warrant, and not as to the right of a tenant who was entitled to the benefit of exemptions to shield a part of his property other than agricultural products to the value of $1,000 from sale under such proceedings. The contract of lease in the case before us arose under the Constitution of 1868, and the homestead article in that instrument provided that certain real estate together with $1,000 worth of personal property "shall be exempted from forced sale under any process of law." It is clear, we think, that the statutory remedy for the enforcement of a claim for rent is embraced within the terms "any process of law." At common law the landlord could himself distrain for rent or employ a bailiff or servant to do so for him, but under our statute he must make an affidavit setting forth his right to distrain and the amount due, and procure the issuance of a warrant to be levied by designated officers. Clearly the proceeding authorized under the distress warrant is a process of law. Smoot v. Strauss, 21 Fla. 611. By entering into a lease of land we can readily see how it is that a tenant voluntarily subjects himself to the remedies provided by law for the collection of rent due by the terms of the leases to the extent that his property is liable to be taken in satisfaction of such claim. To this extent the decision in Blanchard v. Raines went, but we do not understand that it was there decided that by entering into a mere rental contract the tenant waived his right of exemption under the constitution. It is conceded of course that the party entitled to such exemption can waive it, and it is contended here that by entering into a lease of appellant's land appellee has consented to the sale of his property to satisfy the lien given by statute for the rent, and cannot claim any exemption as against such claim. While the lease in this case contains conditions to be performed by both lessor and lessee, there is no stipulation in it for a lien on any property to secure the rent agreed to be paid. It was decided in Patterson v. Taylor, 15 Fla. 836, that the exemption from forced sale under the constitution was expressly waived by voluntarily executing a mortgage on specific property, and the mortgagor was estopped from asserting his exemption as to such property in the face of such a contract. A waiver of any benefit of the exemption laws, or an agreement that all the debtor's property shall be subject to levy and sale, contained in a promissory note, was held, in Carter v. Carter, 20 Fla. 558, 51 Am. Rep. 618, to be inoperative as against the policy of the exemption laws. It is said in this case that "the object of exemption laws is to protect people of limited means and their families in the enjoyment of such property as may be necessary to prevent absolute pauperism and want, and against the consequence of ill-advised promises which their lack of judgment and discretion may have led them to make, or which they may have been induced to enter into by the persuasions of others." It was decided in Baker v. State, 17 Fla. 406, that the real estate exemption of a party who had enjoyed the same accrued to his heirs notwithstanding the deceased head of the family had not resorted to the statutory method of defining and placing on record the description of the property he intended should constitute his homestead. It cannot be said that the property of the tenant carried on the leased premises or left off is the immediate product of the soil leased, nor does the tenant acquire the title to such property as a result of the tenancy and in subordination to the lien of the statute. If the legislature can declare a lien in favor of the landlord for his rent on all the property of his tenant other than agricultural products, and it follows that by entering into the rental contract alone the tenant thereby pledges his property to pay such claim and waives his constitutional right of exemption therein, then it seems to us that the legislature can by providing similar liens to secure the payment of other debts avoid and annul not only the policy but the plain provisions of the constitution on the subject of exemptions. Food and raiment are as essential to life as a habitation and shelter, and we might find insurmountable difficulty in discriminating against the lien for one class of demands and in favor of the other. The claim for rent was highly favored at the common law, but we are unable to discover any purpose in the constitution to except this demand from those against which the exemptions provided for may be claimed. The constitution exempts to the person entitled thereto $1,000 worth of personal property from forced sale under any process of law, and the legislature cannot indirectly deprive him of such right any more than it can directly do it.

The appellee on the showing made was entitled to his personal property exemption to the limit of $1,000 worth in the personal property other than agricultural products levied upon by the sheriff, and the court did not err in refusing to dissolve the injunction restraining the sale until the further order of the court adjudicating such exemption right. This is the only question arising on the appeal involving the correctness of the order refusing to dissolve the injunction, and the decree of the court below must be affirmed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

John FAWCETT

v.

SUPREME SITTING OF THE ORDER OF IRON HALL.

(.....Conn.....)

1. A court will not turn over to a receiver and assignee of a foreign corporation, who is appointed in another state, a fund which is in the hands of a local receiver, unless satisfied that no injustice would thus be done to citizens in that state.
2. The facts that the seal of a benefit society contains the words "$1,000 in seven years" and the by-laws are so worded as to lead persons to expect not to exceed two assessments per month, which return from such assessments is impossible of accomplishment, thereby furnishing designing men an easy means for entrapping the unwary, do not establish fraud as a matter of law, so as to give the association no right to assessments collected.

3. The Order of Iron Hall was a secret and fraternal society, within the Connecticut statute excepting such societies from the law requiring the authority of the insurance commissioner to entitle a foreign corporation to do insurance business within the state.

NOTE.—Some of the conclusions reached in the above case seem to be at variance with those reached by the Massachusetts court when the rights of the Indiana receiver came before it (Buswell v. Supreme Sitting Order of Iron Hall (Mass.) 23 L. R. A. 846), although in that case the question was 24 L. R. A.

raised in a more preliminary form it being a petition for intervention on the part of the receiver, and the court may not be willing to actually send the funds to Indiana when the time for such action is reached.

4. Funds in the hands of a Connecticut receiver received from trustees of local branches of the Order of Iron Hall in that state and made up of the reserved funds which were in the hands of the trustees of such local branches which had been created by retaining, under the laws of the order, 20 per cent of assessments collected, are subject to an equitable lien on the insolvency of the corporation for repayment of certificate holders in that state, if they elect to treat the contract as rescinded and will be retained for distribution among them instead of paying them over to a receiver and assignee appointed in Indiana, where the corporation was created and is being wound up,—especially where he claims the money for distribution among the creditors of the corporation generally, without any distinction in favor of certificate holders.

(March 6, 1894.)

RESERVATION by the Superior Court for Fairfax County for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Errors as to the distribution of funds belonging to local branches of the Order of Iron Hall, for which Edwin L. Scofield had been appointed receiver for the collection of funds in the state of Connecticut, and for which applications were made by the Indiana receiver, James F. Failey, and by such local branches. Judgment in favor of the local branches advised.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinions. Messrs. Lucius P. Deming and James Bishop, for Branches 894 and 1175:

As the property is all located in this state the appointment of the receiver in Indiana has no effect on the money here, and cannot pass title because the courts of Indiana have no extraterritorial authority.

Y. 248, 48 Am. Rep. 616.

There are three funds and they are separate and distinct:

1. The general fund, raised by taxation and the sale of paraphernalia, supplies, etc., which is used for the payment of expenses.

Articles of Association, Fifth, p. 5; Constitution & Laws, art. 8, § 1, p. 26.

2. The benefit fund which is created by 80 per cent of each assessment and is governed by Law I., p. 29, which law lays down the manner in which it shall be collected and disposed of.

3. The reserve fund.

The reserve fund is a separate and distinct fund governed by a separate law and is under the control and supervision of the branch which creates it.

Constitution, etc., pages 35, 36, 37.

This reserve fund could not be touched by the supreme sitting until after the expiration of six years and six months. Up to that time it could not be used or called for by it for any purpose whatsoever.

At the end of that period, to wit, six years and six months, one seventh could be called for and used in the payment of benefits. No more could be called for until the next year, and no branch could be compelled to draw from its reserve fund or pay any more until the expiration of seven years and six months, and yearly thereafter the supreme sitting could call for one seventh for the purpose of paying benefits, and for that purpose only.

This is the contract between the branches, or the members composing each branch, and the supreme sitting.

Torrey v. Baker, 1 Allen, 120; Borgmeyer v. Supreme Lodge Knights & Ladies of Honor, 23 Mo. App. 142; Hollenberg v. District No. 1 Independent Order of Elks Benth, 94 N. Y. 580; Illinois Masons' Benev. Soc. v. Baldwin, 86 Ill. 482; Yos v. Howard Masonic Mut. Benev. Assn. of Baltimore, 68 Md. 86.

The supreme sitting is now in such a condition that it is impracticable and impossible for the defendants "(i. e. the supreme sitting) to lawfully proceed with or to continue its business."

So that it is impossible and impracticable for the supreme sitting to lawfully collect this money and use it for the payment of benefits.

By the contract made with the branches it was agreed that this money should not be used for any other purpose save the purpose which the supreme sitting and the receiver cannot carry out and fulfill.

The receiver is attempting to force a contract which was never made and claims that the money belongs to the supreme sitting which is a claim never made by that body itself.

Courts will see that a trust fund is appropriated to the object designed and will not suffer it to be diverted unless with the consent of the contributors.

Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 89; Duke v. Fuller, 9 N. H. 586, 32 Am. Dec. 392.

Funds contributed by members of a voluntary society for a specific purpose must be paid back to the contributors in proportion to their contributions when not needed for the object.

Niblack, Mut. Ben. Soc. § 150; Koehler v. Brown, 2 Daly, 78.

This court should do what the courts of other states, notably Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and New York have done, where this question has been tried, order the money back into the hands of the people who paid it and let them dispose of it as they see fit.

Lindquist v. Glines, 8 Misc. 314.

Mr. Henry G. Newton, for Durham Branch:

Section 2983 of the General Statutes, as amended by chapter 96 of Public Acts 1889, provides that "It shall not be lawful for any corporation or association organized under other authority than the laws of this state for the purpose of furnishing health or accident insurance or indemnity, upon the assessment plan, to do any business in this state unless authorized by the insurance commissioner."

Said corporation has never been authorized to do insurance business in the state of Connecticut.

Clearly it cannot maintain an action in this state and cannot recover this money.

It is more equitable that this money should be left in the hands of those who have paid it. For every dollar which has been paid into this reserve fund four dollars have already been sent to Indiana for the benefit of the older Indiana branches. Has not Indiana had enough from Connecticut by means of this new order which her citizens have the credit of originating?

If the Connecticut members retain this fifth part of what they have paid in, the Indiana members will still reap a bountiful harvest.

Lindquist v. Glines, 8 Misc. 214.

No holder of a certificate in an insurance company should by law or custom lose his right to share in the assets because of the failure to pay any premium coming due after the insolvency; neither should one of these branches.

Re Equitable Reserve Fund Life Assn. of New York, 181 N. Y. 354.

The courts of this state will not send its citizens to a foreign state for a remedy which can be had equally well here.

Stanton v. Embry, 46 Conn. 595; Redmond v. Hoge, 3 Hub. 171.

If a citizen of this state should attach the fund which belonged to the insolvent corporation in the hands of debtors in this state, the right of the attaching creditor would be preferred to that of the receiver.

Upton v. Hubbard, 28 Conn. 374, 78 Am. Dec. 670; Paine v. Lester, 44 Conn. 196, 26 Am. Rep. 442; Egbert v. Baker, 58 Conn. 819; Crouse v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 58 Conn. 177.

Under these circumstances the court owes a legal duty to the plaintiff which is far more imperative than the demands of mere hospitality to a stranger.

Paine v. Lester, 44 Conn. 204, 26 Am. Rep. 442.

Mr. William F. Henney also for Connecticut local branches.

Mr. Henry C. Robinson, for James F. Failey, principal receiver:

Because of certain irregularities in the management of the affairs of the order the members of the fraternity at headquarters thought the funds would be more likely to get to their owners if the supreme justice and supreme cashier and other supreme officers could be relieved of their care and the same could be put into honest hands under the control of the court. And so citizens of Indianapolis, members of the corporation, brought their petition to the Marion county court in Indiana asking for a receiver. The prayer was granted and Mr. Failey, a gentleman of character and responsibility, was appointed and was duly qualified with an immense bond. The rascally managers fought the application again and again, but the court stood by the fraternity.

Supreme Sitting Order of Iron Hall v. Baker, 20 L. R. A. 210, 134 Ind. 298.

Mr. Failey was appointed in August, 1892. The officers were compelled by the court to assign everything to him for the certificate holders.

In our own state Mr. Fawcett, the plaintiff in this suit, on the petition now before the court, obtained the appointment of a receiver for the property in Connecticut belonging to the fraternity. Some of the property has been paid into court, and the principal receiver and the several contributing branches have filed their claims under order of court, and the court asks the advice of the supreme court as to the proper disposition of the funds.

The claim made by the domiciliary receiver is sound by every principle of law and equity.

The limitation upon the supreme sitting as to calls for the reserve fund is not a limitation in favor of a branch, nor does the feature contain any suggestion that the branch owns the fund.

It is a limitation by the brotherhood upon its own property for its own reasons of prudence and attractiveness.

For safety's sake, and especially to make the order popular, local loans were encouraged and the supervision of these loans, which had to be given to some local residents, was naturally given to the branches, who were required by the order to protect the order against loss by taking bonds.

In this the branches, as branches, were merely the agents of the order.

Schunck v. Gegenseitiger Wittwen und Waisen Fond, 44 Wis. 369; Erdmann v. Mutual Ins. Co. of Order of Herman's Sons of Wisconsin, Id. 376; Lyon v. Supreme Assembly of Royal Soc. Good Fellows, 158 Mass. 83.

All the title which the association had in the reserve fund has been vested in the principal receiver by decree of the home court and by the forced assignment made by its officers.

He is the successor of the corporation itself which owned it.

He is the successor of the parties who created the fund.

The principal receiver alone represents the general purpose of the fund.

The principal receiver is especially vested by the decree of the domiciliary court with all the funds held by the branches.

To order these funds to be distributed upon state or any other geographical lines would make hotch-pot of the property.

There can be no claim that the members here are local creditors.

But if they are creditors they are only creditors in common with the whole fraternity.

The corporation is an Indiana corporation, and may travel into all the states carrying its charter with it, subject to such restrictions as sister states choose to impose, and these funds vest in Mr. Failey under that charter.

The rights of receiver Failey are paramount, and the court will assist to enforce them.

Under the principle of comity, the courts of one jurisdiction can recognize the authority and permit the exercise of functions of a receiver appointed in another jurisdiction, except in those cases where a court of the former jurisdiction finds that its own policy will be displaced or the rights of its own citizens invaded or impaired. This is especially true where such receiver is, by the terms of his appointment to gather the assets wherever found.

It is altogether unnecessary that the property should be within the jurisdiction of the court making the original appointment.

Baldwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Supreme Sitting of the Order of the Iron Hall was duly incorporated, under the General Laws of the state of Indiana, in 1881. Its corporate purposes were defined, in the third of its articles of association, as being "to unite in bonds of union, protection, and forbearance all acceptable white persons of good character, steady habits, sound bodily health, and reputable calling, who believe in a supreme intelligent being, the creator and preserver of the universe; to improve the condition of its membership, morally, socially, and materially, by instructive lessons, judicious counsel, and timely aid, by encouragement in business, and by assistance to obtain employment when in need; to establish a benefit fund, from which members of the said order who have complied with all its rules and regulations, or the heirs of such member, may receive a benefit in a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars ($1,000), which shall be paid in such sums and at such times as may be provided by the laws governing such payment, or in the certificate of membership, and when all the conditions regulating such payment have been complied with." Its "proper officers" were to have "power at any time when a liability on account of the sickness, disability, or maturity of certificate of a member entitled to a benefit under number three of these articles occurs, to make the proper and specified assessment, under the prescribed regulation, to meet such liability."

By article 2, section 3, of the "constitution" of the order, duly adopted pursuant to its articles of association, one of its objects was particularly declared to be "to establish a benefit fund, from which those who have held membership in the order for thirty days or more may, should they so desire, on proper application, and complying with all the rules and regulations governing said benefit fund, become participants therein, and may receive the benefit of a sum not exceeding twenty-five dollars per week, nor more than one half of the sum total held by each member, when, by reason of disease or accident, they become disabled from following their usual occupation, or an amount of not more than one thousand dollars when they have held a continuous membership in the order for seven years: provided, however, that the sum total drawn from this order by any of its members shall never exceed, both in sick, disability, and other benefits, the sum named in the certificate of membership."

Among the "Laws of the Supreme Sitting," made pursuant to its constitution, were the following:

"Law I. Benefit Fund.

"Section 1. There shall be attached to this order a benefit fund, in which members may participate (except social members), as they may severally elect, either in the sum of one thousand dollars, eight hundred dollars, six hundred dollars, four hundred dollars, or two hundred dollars, on which they shall pay the rates and be entitled to the benefits prescribed in the following table. The members of the sisterhood branches (except social members) may participate in the benefit fund, as they may severally elect, either in the sum of six hundred dollars, four hundred dollars, or two hundred dollars, on which they shall pay the rates and be entitled to the benefits prescribed in the following table: provided, that all payments shall be made in accordance with the following sections, and in no other way or manner:

"Table of Rates and Benefits.

Amount Paid on Each Assessment.	Weekly Benefit when Sick or Disabled.	Amount Paid on Total Disability	Payable at Death.	Benefits Paid at End of Seven Years not to Exceed
$2.50	$25.00	$500.00	$500.00	$1,000.00
2.00	20.00	400.00	400.00	800.00
1.50	15.00	300.00	300.00	600.00
1.00	10.00	200.00	200.00	400.00
.50	5.00	100.00	100.00	200.00

"Law II. Reserve Fund.

"Section 1. Twenty per cent of the amount received by each branch on each assessment shall be set aside and retained as a reserve fund. At the expiration of the first term of six years and six months from the date of the organization of the order, one seventh of the reserve fund then on hand shall be called for by the supreme accountant, and used by the supreme cashier in the payment of benefits, and annually thereafter one seventh of the reserve fund on hand shall be called for, and used in like manner.

"Sec. 2. Each branch shall have supervision of the reserve fund, and when said reserve fund shall amount to fifty dollars, the trustees, in conjunction with the cashier of the local branch, shall invest the same in registered United States government bonds, county and city bonds, in first-class mortgages on real estate, or it shall be deposited at interest in some reputable savings bank; provided, that no loan shall be made for a longer period than six years from the end of the term to which said reserve fund belongs, interest to be computed, or paid, semi-annually. Should a loan be made on real estate, it shall be on first mortgage, and not exceed one half of the taxed value of said real estate. No local branch of the order shall loan any portion of its reserve fund on chattel mortgages, and any local branch that shall allow its officers to loan any of the reserve fund or its accumulations contrary to law shall be declared suspended by the supreme justice, and shall not be reinstated until all funds are safely secured to the order as the law directs.

"Sec. 3. Each branch may remit its reserve fund to the supreme cashier for investment by the supreme trustees to the credit of said branch, charging him with the amount of such reserve fund so remitted for investment, and the supreme cashier shall receipt for the same on an official blank for that purpose. The supreme trustees are hereby empowered to invest said funds in accordance with section 2 of this law."

"Law I.

"Sec. 2. When the amount received for one assessment, less the reserve fund, as provided for in Law II., section 1, shall equal an amount less than one thousand dollars, the sum to be paid shall in no case exceed the amount of one assessment, less the reserve. In such case, if the member's certificate be in the amount of one thousand dollars, he shall receive not more than the whole amount of said assessment; if in the amount of eight hundred dollars, not more than four fifths of said assessment; if in the amount of six hundred dollars, not more than three fifths of said assessment; if in the amount of four hundred dollars, not more than two fifths of said assessment; and if in the amount of two hundred dollars, not more than one fifth of said assessment; and said amounts shall be all that can be claimed by any one."

"Sec. 4. Each member of the benefit fund, on becoming liable, shall pay to the accountant the amount prescribed in the foregoing table on account of the benefit fund, and the same amount on each assessment thereafter while he remains a member of this order. The accountant shall keep the date when such payment is made, and credit the member with the same in the books provided for that purpose.

"Sec. 5. The sum as prescribed in the member's certificate shall be paid to the member, his widow, or the legal heirs of said member, in case of sickness, disability, or maturity, and such payment shall be made as hereafter prescribed, and according to the conditions set forth in said certificate.

"Sec. 6. On the sickness or disability of a member, or the maturity of a certificate, the accountant of the local branch shall immediately notify the supreme accountant, upon the official blanks provided for that purpose by the supreme sitting, giving full particulars and the date of the last assessment paid by said member."

"Sec. 11. On receipt of duly approved claims for sickness or disability or maturity of certificate of a member, the supreme accountant shall draw an order on the supreme cashier in favor of the proper person or persons for the amount due, signed by the supreme justice, and forward the same to the accountant of the local branch of which the beneficiary is a member: provided, that, in case of continuous sickness or disability, a member shall be entitled to present a claim for benefits at intervals of four weeks or less, and shall be entitled, when approved, to a payment on account of said claim, for which the members shall give to the supreme sitting a receipt in full of said payment, and in all cases it shall be charged upon the benefit fund ledgers of the supreme accountant and supreme cashier.

"Sec. 12. Upon receipt of the order for the payment of a sickness or disability benefit, or a matured certificate, the accountant shall immediately turn the same over to the person or persons in whose favor it is drawn; before delivering the order, he shall obtain a receipt in full of said payment on the certificate, and instruct the members to forward the warrant to the supreme cashier for payment: provided, that in cases of the maturity of certificate, when the payment cancels the certificate, the certificate, duly canceled and attested by the officers of this local branch, must accompany the warrant for collection."

"Sec. 14. After paying any of the above benefits, if the supreme treasurer requires, an assessment shall be made; the supreme accountant shall make a call on each local branch for the money of each member belonging to the benefit fund. Such call shall be in accordance with a form prescribed by the supreme sitting, and shall include a list of all claims received for adjustment subsequent to the last assessment.

"Sec. 15. Whenever an assessment is called for, the accountant shall certify to the cashier the amounts due the supreme treasurer, on account of the benefit fund, by the terms of the call of the supreme accountant. The cashier of the local branch shall thereupon immediately forward to the supreme cashier the amount so certified by the accountant, and at once notify the accountant of this branch, in writing, of the amount so forwarded. A branch failing to comply with this section within thirty days shall stand suspended from that date until all arrearages are paid. And should a branch fail to pay all arrearages within thirty days from the date of suspension, they shall be declared defunct, and the reserve fund, charter, and all other property shall be at once demanded by the supreme accountant, in accordance with laws governing the same.

"Sec. 16. When an assessment is made, it shall be the duty of the accountant to at once notify every member liable to the said assessment that the same has been issued. Assessment notices shall bear the seal of the branch, and shall be upon the blanks furnished by the supreme sitting, and its date shall be the same as that of the notice received from the supreme accountant. Each member who fails to pay the assessment called for, to the accountant, within thirty days from the date of the notice, shall stand suspended, without further notice. Any branch failing to enforce the law against any member who becomes delinquent on assessments shall pay out of its general fund all assessments and fines which become due from such member, and which are not paid by them, so long as they are permitted to remain in good standing."

"Law V.

"Sec. 8. Any branch failing to comply with the constitution and laws of this order, after becoming suspended, shall become liable to the supreme sitting for all that appears in its benefit, reserve, and general fund accounts, as kept by the supreme accountant, and more, if so shown by the accounts of the branch; and does hereby agree, should suit be instituted against such branch, upon proper proof of the correctness of the account, to confess judgment for the same, and all costs incurred by the supreme sitting in making such collections, and that each officer and member thereof agrees thereto to become immediately responsible to the supreme sitting for the whole amount of such judgment."

Each local branch annually elected, among other officers, an accountant, cashier, and three trustees; and the "constitution governing local branches" contained the following provision:

"Article V.

Sec. 10. The trustees shall have the general supervision of all the property of this branch. They shall, in conjunction with the cashier, invest in such securities as they know to be safe such sums as this branch orders drawn from the treasury for that purpose. They shall have the custody of all securities of this branch for money loaned or invested, except, should the branch become suspended, they then go into the hands of the supreme trustees. They shall collect or realize all such sums when so directed by this branch. They shall collect all the interests, rents, or other money arising from said investments belonging to this branch, and pay the money collected by them to the accountant. They shall, on the 30th day of June and the 31st day of December of each year, report their transactions to this branch, and make an inventory of all property. Before entering upon the duties of their office, they shall each give bond, with approved security, for such sum as this branch may require for the faithful performance of their duties: provided, the sum shall not be less than five hundred dollars each, which bond shall be approved by the branch and deposited with the supreme justice."

Every member electing to participate in the benefit fund received, on the application of his branch, a certificate from the supreme accountant, in a form, duly prescribed by the supreme sitting, reading as follows:

"No. _____ $1,000.00.
"Supreme Sitting of the Order of the Iron Hall.

"Membership Certificate.

"This certificate is issued to _____, a member of Local Branch No. _____, Order of the Iron Hall, located at _____, state of _____, upon evidence received from said local branch that _____ was duly initiated on the _____ day of _____, 189—, and upon the conditions that the statements made by him in his application for membership in said local branch and the statement, certified to by him, by the medical examiner, both of which are filed in the supreme accountant's office, be and are hereby made a part of this contract, and upon conditions that the said member complies with all the laws, rules, and regulations now governing said local branch and its funds; and that said member further agrees to comply with all future laws that may be hereafter enacted by the supreme sitting to govern said branch and funds. These conditions being fully complied with, the Supreme Sitting, Order of the Iron Hall, hereby promises and binds itself to pay out of its relief and reserve funds a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, in accordance with, and under the provisions of the laws, of the order governing such funds and their payments, upon satisfactory evidence of the sickness, disability, or death of said member, or upon its termination, upon the proper receipt of partial payments made thereon, and upon the surrendering of the certificate at its legal termination: provided, that said member is in good standing in this order, and provided, also, that this certificate shall not have been surrendered by said member to any other person or persons, except, in case of death, to his legal heirs, in accordance with the laws of this order. It is fully understood and agreed that the mailing of notices of assessments to the last-known residence or address of the member, ten days prior to the expiration of the time, named therein, within which the payment called for thereby should be made, or the personal delivery of such notices three days prior to said expiration of time, shall be a final and legal serving of the same, and, when so mailed or delivered, all responsibility of the order, or any branch or officer thereof, shall finally cease and determine. This certificate shall be in force from its date, when attested by the signatures of the chief justice and accountant, and an impression of the seal of the above-named branch, and accepted by the aforementioned member, all in accordance with the form printed thereon. If not so attested and accepted, within three months from its date, it shall become, ipso facto, null and void, and of no effect whatever. All the funds now in the hands of the Connecticut receiver were collected by him from local branches of the order in this state, or from trustees appointed by them, and belonged to the "reserve funds" held for the benefit of members of the order who had elected to take benefit certificates. It is plain that the contract set forth in these certificates is one between the holder and the Supreme Sitting of the Order of the Iron Hall, and that the promise of the latter for the ultimate payment of the stipulated benefit is not made dependent on the sufficiency of the reserve fund of the particular local branch to which the holder belongs, nor secured by any pledge of such fund. If the entire reserve fund of any local branch should be lost, by unfortunate investments, whether made by the local trustees or the "supreme trustees" of the corporation, its obligation to meet the certificates held by members of such branch would be unaffected. Of the assessments payable from time to time under Law 1, section 1, 80 per cent went immediately into the treasury of the corporation, to reimburse it for payments already made on matured certificates, or to be used for the payment of certificates as they might mature, without any discrimination between the members of different branches. The remaining 20 per cent was to be retained and invested, subject to be drawn upon, in favor of the order, only to the extent of one seventh of its total amount annually, which was to be "used by the supreme cashier in the payment of benefits." Each local reserve fund was therefore a fund held in trust for the payment, through the general officers of the corporation, in its behalf, and out of its treasury, of benefits to certificate holders. In the hands of the receiver appointed by the superior court, it stands, of course, charged with the same trust. If the corporation were now in a condition to fulfill its obligations to certificate holders, by the aid of the several trust funds held by the local branches, and to discharge the trusts upon which it might receive them, according to the terms of the certificates and the rules of the order, it would be our duty to advise that the receiver in this state should remit all moneys in his hands to the proper officers of the order. But the corporation is insolvent, and unable to carry out the purposes of its organization, and has assigned all its right and title to these funds to James F. Failey, a citizen of Indiana, who had previously been appointed, by a court of that state, receiver of all its estate, wherever situated. Mr. Failey, as such receiver and assignee, has appeared as a defendant in this cause, and claims the funds.

Before the courts of Connecticut can sanction such a change of trustees, they must be satisfied that no injustice would thus be done to the citizens of their own state. The local branches and trustees, out of whose charge these funds have been taken by the order of the superior court, have appeared before us, and, in behalf of those whom they represent, unanimously object to any transfer to the Indiana receiver. By the decree of the court under which he, Failey, was appointed, made on August 28, 1892, he was ordered to collect all reserve funds in the hands of any local branches, whether within or without the state of Indiana, and all such branches were ordered to pay the same to him, and enjoined from any other disposition of them. He was also required to report to the court any instance of neglect to comply with the terms of such order, on the part of any person or branch, "when such further order will be made in such behalf as to the court shall in such case seem meet." All branches making such payments by October 10, 1892, were to be entitled to share in the distribution of the estate. On December 2, 1893, another decree was passed in the same suit, confirming that of August 28, as to the provisions above mentioned, except that the receiver was directed to inform the courts in other states, which had appointed receivers of the corporation, of the terms of both decrees, and request them, and the receivers by them appointed, to account to him, and to pay over to him all moneys in their hands, "to be by him taken and held, together with the funds on hand, as the property of said defendant, the Supreme Sitting of the Iron Hall, which moneys, together with all the other moneys coming to the hands of said receiver herein, shall be hereafter equitably distributed among the creditors and certificate holders of the said defendant." All members of local branches thereafter properly accounting for and paying over to him, within a reasonable time, all money and property in their possession, or who had accounted, or might within a reasonable time account, in any other state, to any local receiver, who thereafter, within a reasonable time, should account for the same to Mr. Failey, as principal receiver, were declared entitled to share in the distribution of the funds in the latter's hands, when made, equally and ratably "with the creditors and certificate holders of the said defendant corporation." Any neglect or refusal of any courts or receivers to comply with the request of the Indiana receiver for a transfer to him of the funds in their custody, he was "directed with due speed to report," whereupon such order was to be made "as at such time may seem proper." These provisions of the decree were predicated on a finding that "attachment and receivership suits have been brought against the defendant, the Supreme Sitting of the Order of the Iron Hall, in very many states and jurisdictions throughout the United States, and that in such proceedings the courts have taken into possession and control the property of the said defendant, the Supreme Sitting of the Order of the Iron Hall, in such states and jurisdictions, and now hold the same under the orders of the various courts."

The following facts are also set forth in the same finding: At the commencement of the suit in Indiana, which was on July 29, 1892, there were over 1,000 local branches of the order in different parts of the United States and Canada, of whose members over 60,000 held benefit certificates. The order had received nearly $6,000,000, net, from these certificate holders, and their certificates called for benefits which, at the maximum rate, would amount to about $49,000,000. To meet these obligations the order had in its treasury, to the credit of the "benefit fund," about $1,000,000, according to its books; of which, however, owing to fraud and mismanagement, less than a quarter of a million was available. It also had on hand nearly $350,000 belonging to the "reserve fund," and the several local branches had under their control further sums belonging to the same fund, to the aggregate amount of $1,380,000. The other funds of the order amounted to but about a quarter of a million dollars. The several local "reserve funds" held in Connecticut amounted to $13,667.05, and the Connecticut certificate holders, who had paid it in, had therefore contributed to the "benefit fund" $74,668.20, which had been remitted to the general treasury. They numbered 1,098. Four of the Connecticut branches had accounted to the Indiana receiver, and paid over to him, together, over $3,000. Two of them, after his appointment, distributed the "reserve funds" in their hands among their members. All of them have ceased to hold regular meetings, and to carry out the purposes of their organization. On February 25, 1893, Mr. Failey filed in the superior court, in the present action, his claim to all the funds in its custody, in which he states that they belong to him, as principal receiver, "for the benefit of all the creditors of the corporation, to be distributed according to the constitution and laws of the corporation, and that no particular branch, anywhere situated, has any claim to the reserve fund, but that the same and all reserve funds belong to the order." The local branches in Connecticut, from whom or whose trustees the Connecticut receiver has collected the funds in controversy, have a right to be amply protected by the court in obedience to whose decree they have made such payments; and this right extends equally to those by whom these funds were originally contributed,—the certificate holders, who became such as members of these branches. The first Indiana decree proposed to admit, to a share in the distribution of the funds coming into the hands of the Indiana receiver, those having property of the order in their possession who accounted to him by October 10, 1892. The decree of December 2, 1893, extended the limit to "a reasonable time" after notice from him of his claims. Such notice was given to the parties to this suit a year or more ago, by the pleadings on file. The Indiana decree does not appear to recognize, as a justification for delay in such accounting, the orders of courts in other states having jurisdiction of the parties in interest. It seems also to make no distinction, as to those entitled to share in the funds that may come into the hands of the Indiana receiver, between general creditors of the order and the holders of its benefit certificates.

In opposition to the claim of Mr. Failey, it has been urged in argument that he is before us in the position of a plaintiff, having no better rights than the order of which he was appointed receiver, and has since become the assignee; and founding his title to recover the funds in controversy upon a fraudulent compact, namely, the scheme under which the order was organized and conducted. The fraud is said to consist in the offer to certificate holders of more than the assessments to be made upon them could justify; and it is argued that, if they were parties to the wrong, they occupy in this cause the position of defendants, in possession of the fund, so far as equitable right is concerned, and may therefore invoke the protection of the rule, "In pari delicto melior est conditio possidentis." But the certificates contain no promise to pay any particular sum, nor do the constitution or laws of the order impose any limit on the number of assessments that can be laid. The obligation of the corporation,—so far as appears from the face of the papers which express it,—would be satisfied by paying the holder of a matured certificate any sum, however small, and its right to enforce contribution from him is only limited by reference to the necessities of the treasury on account of previous payments on other certificates. There was no representation that the assessments or other funds of the order, except the 20 per cent reserve fund, were to be left to accumulate, to provide means for the ultimate payment of what might become due on certificates. On the contrary, it was expressly stated that such assessments were to be used to reimburse the order for prior expenditures. The obligations of each year were to be discharged by the use of four fifths of the assessments of the year, and the remaining fifth, only, was to be kept for future recourse. In ordinary contracts of life insurance, where a fixed sum is promised, in consideration of fixed premiums, payable at stated intervals, the maintenance of an adequate and accumulating reinsurance reserve is an essential part of the plan; but what is known as "co-operative insurance" proceeds upon a different theory, and relies mainly upon the assessments and lapses of each year to meet the calls for maturing benefits.

It has also been argued that, if there be no fraud apparent in the constitution, rules, and laws of the defendant order, yet its whole dealings in this state have been of so fraudulent a character as to deprive its assignee and receiver of any right to claim the fund in controversy by an appeal to the doctrine of comity. The superior court has found that the order was duly incorporated under the laws of Indiana; and it has not found any facts showing as matter of law the existence of fraud in its contracts or management in this state. It is evident that the rules and laws of the corporation are such as to furnish an easy means for designing men, if placed in official positions, to entrap the unwary by false and alluring representations as to the large returns to be derived from small contributions. The seal of the order displayed on the benefit certificates, and on the pamphlet containing the constitution, rules, and laws, bears upon its face the device of a safe, with the figures "$1,000" at its top, and beneath it the words "in seven years." One of the rules, which provides that, if two assessments are laid in any month, the first shall be laid on the first day of the month, and the second on the fifteenth, might easily give a casual reader the impression that in no month could more than two assessments be laid, whereas treble that number could hardly suffice to provide for the maximum benefits. But while these are all circumstances entitled to great consideration, upon any inquiry into the truth of charges of fraud against the officers of the order, they do not establish its existence as a conclusion of law. Fraud is never presumed. The place to prove it, in a case like this, is in the superior court, and the record of the proceedings in that court fails to show that the charge now made was there maintained. Nor do we think the standing of the corporation or its receiver before us is affected by Gen. Stat., § 2992, by reason of the fact that it has done business in this state without authority from the insurance commissioner, though it may have been incorporated in another state for the purpose, among other things, of furnishing insurance on the assessment plan. Every "secret or fraternal society" is excepted from the operation of that statute by Id. § 2903, and the defendant corporation appears to us to be one answering both these descriptions. "Secret work," by article 11 of the constitution, is one of the functions of the supreme sitting," and the branches are to meet with a "watchman" at the outer and "vidette" at the inner door. But while, restricted as we are to the consideration of questions of law, we cannot say that there was fraud in the original purposes of the defendant corporation, or in its dealings in this state, nor that there was any statutory impediment to its doing business here, the comity which permitted it to come here to organize its local branches, and contract with their members, does not require us, in determining the consequences of such contracts, in view of its present position, to overlook the claims of citizens of Connecticut to the protection of its courts. The controversy before us is as to the possession of a trust fund in the hands of the court. The trusts upon which it is held will be the same, whoever may be the trustee. It is made up of several smaller funds, each of which was under the control and management of local trustees in this state, until the court required them to surrender it to its receiver. He now, as regards the claim of Mr. Failey, represents their rights, as well as those of the cestuis que trustent. These local trustees were properly constituted, and no act of maladministration is alleged against them. If their possession could not be disturbed by the Indiana receiver, neither can his be. Cooke v. Warner, 56 Conn. 284, 289. The contract between the certificate holder and the corporation was, by its express terms, made subject to the rules and laws of the order. For its due performance, on the part of either party, it was necessary that the corporation should maintain its connection with the local branch to which the holder belonged, and continue in active existence as a "going concern." Payments upon the certificate were to be made out of a "benefit fund," raised by assessments levied by the corporation on the several local branches, on account of those of their members who held certificates. The local branch was required to forward 80 per cent of the total amount called for, "immediately," to the "supreme treasury" of the corporation, and to notify each certificate member of the call, whereupon he was obliged to pay the amount of his assessment to the branch within thirty days from the date of the original call. Twenty per cent of this was to be left with trustees appointed by the branch, and under bonds to its "chief justice" and "vice justice." The bonds were all payable to these officers, "in trust for said branch," should the trustee fail to account for the funds, at the end of his term, to his "successor in office, or to whoever may be legally appointed to receive the same." Assessments were to be levied only when previous payments by the corporation out of the benefit fund had so reduced it that it required to be replenished. The amount to be paid on each matured certificate was also to be determined, within a certain maximum limit, by the managers of the corporation; and as it was to be liquidated by means of an order on the "supreme cashier," drawn by the "supreme accountant," and signed by the "supreme justice," it would seem that the corporation intended to reserve some discretionary power to regulate the sum by the state of the treasury.

It is obvious, as we have already said, that the corporation looked to calls upon certificate holders in each year for the means to pay the benefits accruing during the year, and to maintain the "reserve fund," which, with the aid of lapses, it was hoped would avoid the necessity of any burdensome multiplication of assessments. In 1892, upon the insolvency of the corporation and the appointment of receivers in different states, the receipts from assessments stopped, the branches generally ceased to meet, and the order became disorganized, and practically dissolved. The carcass remained, but the life was gone. The end was reached, so far as the rights of certificate holders are concerned, on July 29, 1892, the day when the suit was instituted in Indiana for the appointment of a receiver. In view of the condition of the corporation at the time, and the probability of such an appointment, no certificate holder could have been expected to make any future payment to it for assessments. The performance, on its part, of the contract of the order with the certificate holders, having by its fault become impossible, each of these had the right to elect whether to treat the contract as rescinded, and demand a return of what he had paid on it, or to treat it as in force, and claim the damages resulting to him from the corporation having put itself in a condition incompatible with the fulfillment of its engagements. 2 Saunders, Pl. & Ev. *674; Lyon v. Annable, 4 Conn. 350, 355. The Connecticut certificate holders, represented before us through the several trustees or branches who have appeared or pleaded in the cause, have unanimously elected the former course, and such election has been sufficiently and seasonably made known by the answers and claims which have been filed. Under these circumstances, we think equity will best be done, as between the parties before us, by retaining the funds in controversy in the hands of the receiver appointed by the superior court, for distribution among the certificate holders of the order, by whose contributions they were originally accumulated. Re Equitable Reserve Fund Life Assn. 181 N. Y. 854; Lindquist v. Glines, 8 Misc. 214; Pelts v. Supreme Chamber Order of Financial Union (N. J.) 19 Atl. Rep. 668; Fogg v. Supreme Lodge United Order of Golden Lion, 156 Mass. 431, 159 Mass. 9. For every dollar paid by them to the accountant of their local branches, 80 cents has been transmitted to the general treasury of the order, to reimburse it for benefits paid to other certificate holders, and 20 cents has been reserved to meet similar claims to mature thereafter. It is to the reserve funds, thus constituted, that contributors, electing to rescind the contract evidenced by their benefit certificates, have a right to look primarily for repayment of their advances. These funds were manifestly left, by the laws of the order, in the hands of the local branches for their better assurance. As against the demand of a foreign receiver and assignee, we think the members of each branch, whose contributions created its reserve fund, have, under the conditions disclosed in the record of this cause, an equitable lien upon it, which the courts of their own state can best protect, especially where he claims it for distribution among the creditors of the corporation generally, without any distinction in favor of certificate holders. In quoting the constitution and laws of the defendant corporation, the edition of 1888 has been followed. We have not found it necessary to consider the effect of the changes of phraseology found in later editions, and which it is claimed were made without authority; since, while they might serve to strengthen the legal title of the corporation to the custody of the various reserve funds, they cannot vary the trusts upon which they were created and must be administered.

The superior court is advised to direct the distribution of the funds now in the hands of Edwin L. Scofield, receiver, after payment of necessary costs and charges, among the holders of benefit certificates issued by the Supreme Sitting of the Order of the Iron Hall, to them, as members of branches of the order organized in Connecticut, and outstanding and obligatory upon said corporation on July 29, 1892; payments to be made, out of the fund received from the trustees of each local branch, to the certificate holders of that branch, in proportion to the amounts paid by them respectively for assessments laid upon them as holders of such certificates, deducting from such dividends, in each case, such amount, if any, as the certificate holder may have previously received from said order by reason of his rights under his certificate; and to dismiss and disallow the claim of James F. Failey, receiver of said corporation by appointment of the superior court for Marion county, in the state of Indiana, to said funds, or any part thereof.

Andrews, Ch. J., and Torrance and Fenn, JJ., concurred.

Hamersley, J., filed the following opinion:

In the result announced by the majority of the court I concur, but not with the reasons given in support of that result. If the funds in question were accumulated by the defendant corporation in the transaction in this state of a business lawful under our laws, then such funds ought to be placed in the hands of Mr. Failey, the principal and domiciliary receiver appointed by the Indiana court, unless there are facts in the case which establish some clear ground of exception to the general rule. The rule that when a corporation is chartered by a single state, and does a lawful insurance business in other states through agencies, and becomes insolvent, its assets should be gathered at the domicile, and there distributed according to the principles of equity, is sound, and should be universally observed. It is based upon a recognized principle of international comity, and that principle, as applicable between our several states, rests on reasons far more cogent than the reasons which support the principle as applicable between nations wholly independent. While it is true that for many purposes our states are independent, as really as if they were for all purposes separate sovereignties, and for this reason the rules of international comity may apply to questions arising between citizens of different states, yet it is also true that the citizens of all the states are fellow subjects of one common government, supreme within the sphere of its operation, and that the necessities growing out of such common government impose upon the several states obligations of the highest authority, inconsistent with that cautious and self-protecting administration of the law of comity that may be safely indulged in by states wholly foreign to each other. The full faith and credit positively given in each state to the judicial proceedings of every other state; the good faith and confidence impliedly required in dealing with such judicial proceedings; the commercial necessity of a distribution of assets of an insolvent corporation by one court, growing out of the guaranteed freedom and infinite variety of commercial intercourse; the impossibility, in many cases, of an equitable distribution, except by one court; the concurrent jurisdiction, and at times exclusive jurisdiction, of federal courts in such cases,—all suggest cogent reasons for a loyal observance of the rule stated, unless the particular facts present a plain and unquestioned exception to the rule. It will not, however, be necessary to inquire whether the particular facts in this case do, or do not, present such exception. Mr. Failey practically appears in this matter as a plaintiff; and, as the foundation of his claim and right to the assistance of this court, sets out in full the organization, constitution, and laws of the defendant corporation, and a record containing the findings, orders, and decrees of the Indiana court. The Durham branch, in its demurrer, says that upon the documents set out by Failey, in connection with the findings and orders of the Indiana court, it appears that the business transacted in this state was unlawful, and contrary to public policy; and also, in its claim, alleges as a fact that the defendant corporation was not organized and qualified to do business in this state.

The superior court has made a finding of facts, for the purpose of submitting to this court the whole record, with the facts set forth in the finding, and of obtaining the advice of this court upon all questions arising upon the pleadings and record, including the questions arising upon the demurrer and the overruling thereof, and the question of what judgment upon the facts found should be rendered. In the finding of facts, the court finds, in addition to the facts otherwise appearing on the record, that the Indiana court had made certain further findings of fact, conclusions of law, and orders, which should be added to the record set out and relied upon by Failey in his claim, and makes such findings of fact, conclusions of law, and orders a part of this record; and also finds that of the funds on hand $— were accumulated in 1889 and subsequently (it was stated in argument, and not questioned, that this blank should be filled by a sum representing nearly the whole amount accumulated); and that the corporation has never been authorized to do insurance business in this state. Thus the main and determinative question we are called upon to decide is, upon the facts contained in the record and found by the court, should the superior court now hold that the business transacted in this state by the insolvent corporation was a business contrary to our public policy? This question requires that we should first come to an understanding of the meaning and legal effect of the remarkable mass of words called the constitution and laws of the order of the iron hall. They contain the articles of association, i. e. the charter of the corporation, the constitution adopted by the corporation, the constitution prescribed by the corporation for governing local branches, the general laws adopted by the corporation for its own government and the few special laws governing delegated meetings of local branches, called district meetings, to be from time to time called by officers of, and subject to the control of, the corporation; special laws governing the life division,—which do not appear to have been put into operation; and an official summary of the effect of the constitution and laws in a number of enumerated cases. The meaning of this literature cannot be understood without the most thorough analysis of the whole and every part, and it is too voluminous to be quoted in full; but I am satisfied that a careful examination of the documents establishes the following conclusion: (1) The defendant was incorporated in December, 1881, by filing articles of association, in pursuance of a general statute of Indiana authorizing the incorporation of three or more persons for the purpose of organizing "divisions or associations of temperance, or other charitable associations or orders." The members of the corporation so organized consist, for all practical purposes, of its principal officers. The stated meetings of the corporation are biennial or quadrennial, and the officers are rechosen at such meetings. Eight specified officers must receive salaries, and may receive other compensation. A body called the executive committee exercises all power of the corporation concerning business matters, fixes the salaries and compensation of all officers, and is composed of nine officers, of whom six are of those required to be salaried. (2) The corporation undertakes to accomplish two distinct, though related, objects: First, to organize and govern local branches of a secret social society; second, to establish and carry on an insurance business on the assessment plan, in which the insured must first have been admitted members of the secret society, and must continue in good standing as such members. (3) While the secret social society is under the absolute control of the corporation, the members of the society are not members of the corporation, and the corporation assumes no liability to furnish them the pecuniary aid usually provided by fraternal and mutual aid societies. The members of the society, as such, are called "social members." One of their priv-illeges is the right to apply for insurance, i. e. to become "participant in the benefit fund," and, by the laws governing the secret society, such insured members have the exclusive right to vote and hold office, the privilege of paying dues being common to all the members. The constitution provides that any person who has held a membership in the society for thirty days or more may, if he so desire, become a participant in the benefit fund. To become such participant he must make application, undergo medical examination, sign the obligations relating to conditions of insurance, etc., in the same manner as in the transaction of any insurance business, and the corporation states in its official summary of its laws that before insurance the insured must become "an acceptable social member of the order, which is purely fraternal;" and that, after being a social member thirty days, "he may, if he so desire, make application to become a member of the benefit fund;" or, at his option he may remain a social member for life, and "as such social member he would enjoy all the fraternal and social privileges of the order." And, again, "social members shall pay the same dues as the members of the benefit fund, and cannot vote or hold office neither are they entitled to any benefits for sickness or disability." It is through the local branches of this secret society that the corporation secures its agents and revenue for pushing its scheme of insurance. Each member, whether insured or not, pays into his local branch various fees and dues, by which all its expenses in maintaining attractive social features, and drawing in candidates for the insurance business of the corporation, are provided for. It is also through these local branches that the corporation provides the revenues which it uses for its corporate expenses and to divide as salaries and compensation among the corporators. For such purposes, the branches pay the corporation charter and registration fees, profits on the sale of paraphernalia and supplies, and such per capita tax on all members, whether insured or not, as the corporation sees fit to levy. It is necessary to keep in mind these distinctions. The secret society is not the corporation. The society supplies the corporation with funds for the use of the few corporators, but the corporation is by its laws forbidden to give to members of the society any pecuniary aid in case of sickness, accident, or death. No element of benevolence, charity, or mutual aid exists between the corporation and members of the society. The insurance business is a business distinct from the organization of the secret society, and is transacted directly between the corporation and its certificate holders, just as truly as if the business were carried on, as has been done in connection with the Masonic fraternity, by a corporation having no connection with the fraternity, beyond the fact that its field of insurance is confined to the members of the fraternity in good standing. These distinctions between the corporation and the secret society,—between the corporation as the organizer of the secret society, and as the manager of the insurance business,—are clearly deducible from the constitution and laws submitted to us; although those documents are well calculated, and perhaps intended, to obscure and conceal such distinctions. (4) The insurance business established and carried on by the corporation consists in issuing certificates whereby the corporation undertakes to pay the holder $1,000 in seven years, upon condition that the holder shall pay all assessments of $2.50 when called upon in pursuance of the laws made by the corporation, and upon the further condition that he shall continue a member in good standing of the secret society organized and controlled by the corporation. In order to attract the savings of the very smallest earnings, provision is made for issuing similar certificates for the payment of one, two, three, or four fifths of $1,000, upon condition of paying assessments of one, two, three, or four fifths of $2.50. The obligation of the corporation also involves the payment of certain weekly sums in case of the disability of the certificate holder; but, as the whole amount so paid can in no case exceed one half of the sum named in the certificate, and in every case must be deducted from the sum agreed to be paid on its termination, this provision does not affect the character of the principal agreement. The obligation also involves the payment of one half the amount named in the certificate in case of the death of the holder after the first two years of the term: but this provision only covers a life risk for one and one half, or, at most, for five, years, and, in view of the small percentage of mortality in any one term of five years, cannot seriously affect the principle of the insurance. The substantive business consists in the payment of a fixed sum at the end of seven years. The subsidiary provisions may furnish an excuse for calling the business accident and life, as well as endowment, insurance, but are in fact mere incidental attractions for the prosecution of the main scheme, which the whole literature of the corporation, as well as the seal, indicative of its main object described in the charter, authoritatively announces to be the payment of "$1,000 in seven years." The corporation promises to pay $1,000 in seven years in consideration of the payment of the assessments of $2.50 each, and upon the representation that those assessments shall not in the aggregate equal $1,000. Counsel claim that the corporation does not promise to pay $1,000, but only a sum "not exceeding $1,000." I think this error arises mainly from misapprehension of the effect of the certificate. That paper, it is true, contains a promise to pay "a sum not exceeding $1,000," but it contains no promise as to the time or as to any detail. The only promise is to pay a sum "in accordance with and under the provisions of the laws" of the corporation, and this paper is authenticated by the seal of the corporation, which contains the charter, and declaration of its main purpose and object,—"$1,000 in seven years." To the laws we must look for the actual promise. The law says: "There shall be attached to this order a benefit fund, in which members may participate (except social members), as they may severally elect, either in the sum of $1,000, $800, etc., on which they shall pay the rates, and be entitled to the benefits, prescribed in the following table:

Weekly benefit when sick or disabled.....	$25 00
Amount paid on total disability.....	$500 00
Payable at death.....	$500 00
Benefit paid at end of seven years not exceeding.....	$1,000 00

Here is a direct promise that the certificate holder shall participate in the fund "in the sum of $1,000," and "shall be entitled" to "$25 a week during sickness, $500 on total disability, $500 at death (the obligation to pay these sums is absolute,—it is not a mere promise to pay a sum not exceeding $500), and at the end of seven years benefits not exceeding $1,000, i. e. the benefits remaining unpaid of the sum of $1,000, which he has elected as the sum which specifies his participation in the benefits. No other construction can be given this language except as a subterfuge for palpable fraud, and such construction the court cannot give. And this construction of the direct promise of "$1,000 in seven years" is fully confirmed by a careful examination of the whole body of the laws. The only exception to the obligation is contained in the section which provides that, when one assessment of $2.50 shall realize an amount less than $1,000, if the certificate be in the amount of $1,000, the certificate holder shall receive no more than the "whole amount of said assessment." That is, until the business increases so as to include more than 400 certificate holders (the number necessary to produce $1,000 at $2.50 each), each certificate holder whose claim matures must be content with the product of one assessment; and the insertion of this exception is strong affirmation that the promise to pay the whole sum named in the certificate is binding in every other case. Counsel also claim that the business scheme of this corporation does not involve the representation that assessments imposed on the certificate holders shall not in the aggregate equal $1,000. There is no foundation for such a claim. We are called upon to declare the legal meaning of a body of laws prepared for the sole purpose of attracting and building up a large business. The purpose for which such laws are framed is as truly an element in their construction as the contextual meaning of the particular language used to accomplish that purpose. In passing on the character of the business disclosed by laws so framed, we are bound to exercise that knowledge of the patent, well-established, and universally recognized elements of human nature and of business transactions which the court must be presumed to possess. In this case the business, the securing of which is the object and sole object of the laws, consists in obtaining from a large number of the public the payment to the corporation of $2.50 from time to time, upon the promise by the corporation of paying to each contributor $1,000 at the end of seven years. It is certain that such a business cannot exist without the belief on the part of the contributors that the assessments of seven years will be less than $1,000. By the very fact of offering to the public, for the purpose of obtaining business, the prospectus contained in these laws, the corporation makes the representation that $1,000 is to be obtained in seven years by contributing in small sums less than that amount. Such representation is written into their prospectus by the fact of publication, unless it is clearly excluded by the language used. It is true the corporation might have said: "This business cannot honestly be carried on without collecting from each contributor in assessments the full amount of $1,000." If this language had been used, no business would have been done, and the laws would not be before us for construction. Not only is no such language used, but the representation implied in the very fact of presenting this business to the public is plainly set forth in the laws of the corporation. The law providing for the payment of assessments says: "All payments shall be made in accordance with the following sections, and in no other way or manner." And, until the laws are changed, no assessment can be made, except as provided. The only provision for calling for payment of assessments is that, if the treasury requires an assessment shall be made, and that "when it is evident from the claims filed in regular form that two assessments are necessary in any one month, then it shall be the duty of the supreme accountant to make the calls for said assessments at the same time, dating the calls, one on the 1st and the other on the 15th of the month, except when those dates occur on a Sunday or legal holiday, in which case they shall be dated the preceding day." And in its official summary of the law, intended for those unable to wade through the whole mass of legislation, the corporation says: "When it is necessary to call two assessments in one month, they shall be issued from the office of the supreme accountant on the first day of such month, or as near thereto as may be expedient." Surely it needs no argument to show that these laws not only confirm the representation made in the very fact of presenting this scheme to the public, but contain the representation that not more than two assessments a month, i. e. $420 in seven years, will be required to obtain the payment of $1,000, and that therefore the laws make no provision for calling further assessments.

In confirmation of the view taken, attention may be called to the fact that the superior court has made a part of the record of this case conclusions of law found by the Indiana court in the proceeding which Failey sets out as the basis of his claim. These conclusions of law are:

"1. That the defendant, in the issuance of certificates of membership in the benefit fund in the finding of facts described, was engaged in doing a health, accident, life, and endowment insurance business, and the same was neither charity nor benevolence, within the meaning of the statutes and laws of Indiana.

"2. That, under the said contracts made by the defendant with persons holding certificates in the benefit fund, the defendant was bound to pay the full or gross amount severally named in said certificates at the expiration of seven years from the date thereof, if then in force, less the payments (if any) theretofore made on such certificates on account of sickness or disability benefits.

"4. That the defendant is not a mutual company, in the sense that the certificate holders in its benefit fund are members of the [Supreme] Sitting of the Order of Iron Hall, as the certificates constitute contracts entered into by the defendant on the one part and certificate holders on the other part, of the legal tenor and effect stated in the second conclusion above."

We find, therefore, that the record and facts before us clearly establish the conclusion that the essential business carried on in this state by the corporation was the issue of certificates promising the payment of $1,000 in seven years, upon condition that the certificate holder shall pay during that time assessments of the fixed sum of $2.50 each, for the purpose of enabling the corporation, from the money so paid in assessments, to pay $1,000 as each certificate matures; and that this business necessarily involved the representation that the aggregate of assessments in each case would be less than $1,000, and further involved the representation, in fact made in the conduct of the business in this state, that the aggregates of assessments in each case would not exceed $420. The provision for a so-called "reserve fund" does not affect the character of this business. That provision simply permits the reservation of one fifth of each assessment, one seventh of the money so reserved to be used annually in payment of matured certificates, for the purpose of reducing the amount of future assessments. The difficulty with the business consists in the impossibility of paying $1,000 from assessments amounting to $420, or any sum materially less than $1,000; and this difficulty is not to be avoided by using one fifth of the inadequate assessments, at the rate of one seventh a year, for the purpose of reducing the inadequate assessments of the future. Nor is the character of the business materially affected by so-called "lapses," i. e. the possibility of a certain percentage of certificate holders forfeiting the assessments paid, by neglect to continue such payments. If the business really depends on such lapses, and its object is to pay a large profit to matured certificate holders from money obtained by means of such lapses, then the business is unsound and dishonest. But the lapses are a necessary incident, and do not materially affect the character and result of the business. The percentage of such lapses is established by insurance experience; the main portion of such lapses must be at the beginning, and not at the close, of the term the security of the certificate holder must consist in maintaining, not in diminishing, the number of those liable to assessment; and a slight mathematical process will demonstrate that such lapses cannot prevent the eventual loss to some one involved in a business based on a principle of paying $1,000 for $500. Such a business is clearly distinguishable from legitimate insurance. All insurance has a wagering element, and by the common law of this state wagering contracts are unlawful. In insurance, however, the wager is not the controlling element. The object of the contract is protection,—in fire and other insurance of property, protection of the actual value of the property destroyed; in life insurance, protection of the value of a man's life to his family or his creditors. But in any such case, if the element of protection is eliminated, if there is no insurable interest, if the contract is a mere speculative bet on contingencies, if nothing but the wagering element remains, then the contract becomes obnoxious to the law which pronounces wagers illegal. In these certificate contracts there is no element of protection to property; it is purely a business speculation. The bait held out to the certificate holder is the hope of getting $1,000 without paying for it. He risks his little stakes of $2.50 (a small sum, purposely fixed for bringing the temptation home to a great mass of the people), in the expectation of succeeding in the scramble for $1,000 in seven years. This business is also distinguishable from that quasi insurance business, which really partakes more of the nature of investment or savings bank business, called endowment insurance. This is a comparatively new branch of insurance business, but, in states where the standard of safety and solvency has been established by legislation, the law says that for a $1,000 seven-year endowment insurance policy, issued at the age of thirty, the company shall charge, and the insured shall pay, $125.74 each year until maturity; and that, after deducting the current cost of insurance each year, the whole balance must be carefully invested and compounded at the standard rate of interest. Whether this particular regulation is essential to the conduct of the business or not, it is plain that the business of issuing $1,000 seven-year endowment policies indiscriminately to all persons between eighteen and sixty-five, on payments not exceeding $60 a year, cannot be honestly conducted; and such impossibility cannot be altered by calling premiums "assessments." Life insurance may come to be safely conducted on the assessment plan, and possibly human ingenuity may devise a scheme for safely conducting endowment business on that plan; but it is a mathematical certainty that the so-called endowment business this corporation has attempted to conduct can only result in loss to the certificate holders. Still more clearly should this business be distinguished from that of fraternal and mutual aid societies. The latter have no element of speculation. They are purely protective, and are based upon the necessity and duty of mutual aid in time of trouble, and so act as powerful incentives in promoting that cultivation of thrift and mutual helpfulness which is essential to the prosperity and good order of society. For this reason, they are favored by the law, and entitled to its protection. But the former has no element of protection, and is purely speculative. It seeks not to help the unfortunate, but to make profits out of their misfortunes, and tends directly to discourage thrift and promote that speculative spirit which is a serious danger to society. Between these two there is an impassable gulf, and not the least of the injury resulting from the business of this corporation is its direct tendency to discourage and weaken legitimate fraternal and mutual aid societies. This business, therefore, is nominally an insurance business, whose essential characteristics are: (1) The elimination of the protective element of insurance, so that the wagering element ceases to be incidental, and becomes the controlling element; (2) the certainty of ending in a money loss to a large number of certificate holders. Such conclusion is a mathematical certainty. If 14 men agree to pay equal assessments into a common fund, so that at the end of seven years each one may draw out $1,000, it is evident that each will pay in the amount he draws out. Such agreement is harmless, but will never be entered into. If, however, a company issues its certificates promising to pay $1,000 in seven years, upon the payment of such assessments as the certificates mature, and obtains fourteen certificate holders, one each year for fourteen years, and continues the business of collecting assessment and paying benefits until the last certificate matures, we have this result: The first man pays $148 in assessments, and draws out $1,000,—a net profit of $857; the last man pays $3,598 in assessments, and draws out $1,000,—a net loss of $1,598; the first six men make a profit of about $3,000; the seventh and eighth pay in and draw out the same amount, and the last six lose about $3,000; and, in any method adopted for putting in execution such a scheme, either the certificate holders draw out the same amount they pay in, or some members make a profit out of the losses of others. The subsidiary elements introduced by the defendant in its scheme may modify results, but cannot affect the principle. It is an inherent element in every such scheme that, whenever the business closes, some one must be a loser. It is also certain that practically the business cannot be carried on without a rapid increase of members. As soon as the limit of increase is reached, the business must close, and so the extent of the loss will be great in proportion to the success of the business. When to such a scheme is added the fact that the corporation which carries it on makes large gains, proportioned to the extent of its business, and induces the public to take its certificates by the representation that $1,000 will be so gained in seven years through the payment of a much less sum, the fraudulent character of the business becomes yet more apparent and far more dangerous to the public. The facts found in the record before us strikingly illustrate the substantial fraud in which the business set forth in the pleadings must result. It appears from the statement contained in the record of the condition of this company at the time of the appointment to Falley, receiver, that the corporation has received several hundred thousand dollars, used for corporate expenses and for division among its officers, and at the time of failure was in receipt of a revenue for such purposes of upwards of $60,000 a year; that a large number of the earlier certificate holders have received net profits averaging about $420 each; and that the 60,000 remaining certificate holders, if all the money collected for assessments, and not paid out on matured certificates, is divided among them, must lose about $2,000,000. Such is the result of a few years' successful business, when conducted with all the honesty which such a business will permit. This practically illustrates, what the documents before us demonstrate, that the very essence of the business carried on in this state, and which now seeks the aid of the court of equity, is paying unearned profits to the few from the losses of the many.

I believe no case has been decided upon the precise question whether such a business is contrary to public policy, but courts have plainly characterized its nature when opportunity has been given. In Massachusetts, in reference to a corporation doing a somewhat similar business, but organized under a peculiar statute of that state, the court says: "It is not in our power to declare the business contrary to public policy, and a fraud on an unprotected part of the community, since the legislature have authorized it, but it is well to understand with what kind of business we are dealing. No one who does understand it, we think, would hesitate to agree that all legislative conditions must be complied with strictly." Rogg v. Supreme Lodge United Order of Golden Lion, 156 Mass. 481. In New Jersey, in holding that a similar business was not within the meaning of the New Jersey statute authorizing the formation of benevolent and charitable institutions, the court says: "How can it ever be said that the legislature ever intended to allow the learned and skillful, and financially able, to make profit, under the guise of benevolence and charity, out of the unlearned and unskilled, and those who are so unfortunate as to suffer from financial disability? After the fullest and most careful reflection, I am unable to discover any method or principle of law by which this scheme can be sustained under this act. With all due respect to the learned counsel who presented the case for the defendant, it seems to me that the scheme prescribed by the constitution and by-laws in this case has more the appearance of a lottery than of a charity." Pelts v. Supreme Chamber Order of Financial Union, (N. J.) 19 Atl. Rep. 671.

In Pennsylvania, a corporation organized under a general statute authorizing incorporation for the purpose of "the maintenance of a society for beneficial or protective purposes to its members from funds collected therein" attempted a somewhat similar business, and the court of common pleas, in revoking its charter, says: "The leading feature, about which all others cluster, is this vicious proposition to give a man good money for nothing. This cannot be done as a business matter, honestly and fairly." And the supreme court, in sustaining the revocation of the charter, says: "The auditor and the court below have sufficiently demonstrated that the only persons likely to be benefited by the scheme set forth in the charter are the officers themselves. It manifestly belongs to that class of associations, by far too numerous, the practical effect of whose operations is to enrich a few at the expense of confiding and ignorant people. Such corporations are 'unlawful and injurious to the community.'" Re National Indemnity & Endowment Co. 142 Pa. 450. We have before us now a corporation which has carried on in this state the insurance business described, not as a system of mutual aid between the members of a mutual aid society, but independently, the society, such as it is, simply defining the field of insurance; and the question is distinctly raised, is that business contrary to our public policy? In determining this question we are embarrassed by no unfortunate legislation directly or impliedly authorizing such business. It is a fundamental principle of our law that courts will not undertake to administer justice in behalf of one whose claim is based upon a violation of law, whether that law be a statute, a legal principle, or a rule of conduct based upon accepted views of sound ethics and public interest, which has been incorporated into our system of jurisprudence by force of the well-established judicial recognition which defines our unwritten law. Courts are established to settle rights founded in law. They have no jurisdiction of violations of the law, except for the purpose of punishment. This principle is founded in the earliest records of our law, and has been enforced and illustrated in innumerable cases. That the transactions in question are in violation of law is plain. In the first place, the record finds that the corporation "has never been authorized to do insurance business in the state of Connecticut." Section 2892 of the general statutes says: "It shall not be lawful for any foreign corporation, organized for the purpose of furnishing life or accident insurance, or indemnity upon the assessment plan, to do any business in this state unless authorized by the insurance commissioner." Counsel claims that this prohibition has no application, because of a subsequent section which says it shall not be construed to apply to any "secret or fraternal society, nor to any association organized for benevolent and charitable purposes whose members are employed by one or more similar corporations," etc. I think an examination of the whole law clearly shows that the words "secret or fraternal society" include only the well-known class of associations formed for dispensing aid or benefits to their members, and that the exception does not apply to a corporation doing an assessment insurance business distinct from the benevolent operations of any secret or fraternal society. It will hardly be claimed that the mere word "secret" is efficacious to exclude from the operation of the act any corporation that may choose to call its janitor a "watchman," or its doorkeeper a "vidette." But there is no exception to section 2905; and that section provides that no foreign insurance corporation shall, directly or indirectly, transact business in this state, until it shall have first appointed, in writing, the insurance commissioner of this state its lawful attorney, on whom process may be served. The record shows that this has not been done. I do not wish, however, to seek a ground for violation of public policy in the mere failure to comply with such requirements, when the actual transactions have been in violation of rules of conduct touching the gravest interests of society, and which are as well established law as if expressed in the form of a statute. The insurance business of this defendant cannot exist without resulting in a fraud. It cannot be conducted without untrue representations. It is essentially of a wagering nature. Its direct and necessary tendency is an unmitigated public injury. The evils resulting from mere wagering purchases of stock, and which the law condemns as absolutely illegal, are aught compared with the disaster that must follow schemes of insurance which can only be started by appeals to the gambling spirit of a whole people, and can only end in widespread loss. The rules of a public policy which condemn this business are well settled by judicial decisions, and this case really involves no new application of such rules; but if, in fact, it were a case of new application, the public injury is so great, and the violation of plain principles of law so clear, that the court should not hesitate to make the application. In Egerton v. Brownlow, 4 H. L. Cas. 161, Lord Lyndhurst says: "The inquiry must, in each instance where no formal precedent had occurred, have been into the tendency of the act to interfere with the general interest. The rule, then, is clear. Whether the particular case comes within the rule, it is the province of the court, in each instance acting with due caution, to determine." And Lord Chief Baron Sir Frederick Pollock, in the same case (page 149), says: "After all these authorities, am I not justified in saying that, were I to discard the public welfare from my consideration, I should abdicate the functions of my office,—I should shrink from the discharge of my duty?" I think I am bound to look for the principles of former decisions, and not to shrink from applying them with firmness and caution to any new and extraordinary case that may arise." The question before us is not raised by the conflicting claims of the certificate holder and the corporation as to the validity or legal effect of a particular contract, but it is raised by the application of this corporation, through its receiver, asking the aid of a court of equity, for the purpose of settling its affairs, to put him in the possession of money due on account of business transacted in this state. The fact set out in this application, and the finding of the superior court, clearly show that the business so transacted was essentially fraudulent, and in violation of our public policy. The courts of this state cannot assist those who prosecute their business contrary to its settled policy, either in the prosecution of that business, or after its prosecution has ceased. Courts of equity will give no aid even in adjusting the accounts in a partnership formed for such purpose. Watson v. Murray, 23 N. J. Eq. 257; Anderson v. Powell, 44 Iowa, 20; Watson v. Fletcher, 7 Gratt. 1. And a fortiori they will give no aid to a foreign corporation in obtaining possession of property claimed to have been acquired through such violation of law. The claim of Mr. Failey must therefore be denied. There is no question raised as to the jurisdiction of the superior court to distribute the funds now in the hands of Scofield, receiver. There appear to be no creditors, and no parties in interest, except the contributors to these funds. It is alleged and shown that the only protection against the dissipation of these funds through a multiplicity of suits lies in their distribution by order of court. It is doubtless true that, in the complications now existing, the funds can be most speedily and justly distributed through Receiver Scofield. Possibly the view I have taken of the case may involve some modifications of the directions for distribution announced by the court, but such modifications would not be of sufficient practical importance to justify discussion, or to furnish ground for dissent. For the reasons stated, I concur in the advice given to the superior court.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

SUCCESSION OF Joseph HERNANDEZ.

(46 La. Ann.—.)

*1. The prohibition of article 161 of the Code, to the effect that, in case of divorce on the ground of adultery, the guilty party can never contract matrimony with his or her accomplice in adultery, is directed against marriage between the guilty spouse and the particular person or persons who are designated in the petition for the divorce, or described in the evidence in support of it, and upon which petition and evidence the decree of divorce is founded.

2. The prohibition of the statute of New York to the effect that no second or other subsequent marriage shall be contracted by any person, during the lifetime of any former husband or wife of such person, in case the former marriage be annulled or dissolved on the ground of adultery, has no extraterritorial effect, being a penal statute; and it cannot be given the effect of annulling a contract of marriage between persons at the time residing abroad, notwithstanding it was solemnized in the city and state of New York.—the contracting parties announcing their intention to be to thereafter reside in Louisiana, and afterwards actually residing there.

(May 14, 1894.)

A PPEAL by the heirs of Joseph Hernandez, deceased, from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans in favor of one claiming to be Hernandez's widow, in a proceeding by her to obtain possession of certain of his effects, which she claimed under his will. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

NOTE.—Effect of statutes forbidding remarriage of guilty party after divorce.

There is practical unanimity among the decisions in holding that such statutes have no extraterritorial effect and the only point of difference is as to how far and in what manner the guilty person may be punished in the state where the statute exists for a violation of its provisions.

Effect in other states.

If the decree of divorce absolutely dissolves the bonds of matrimony, either party is free to marry again upon going into another jurisdiction, although the law of the place where the divorce was granted prohibits the guilty party from marrying. Scott v. Atty-Gen. L. R. 11 Prob. Div. 123.

The prohibition will not be enforced by other states. Phillips v. Madrid, 13 L. R. A. 862, 83 Me. 206; Dickson v. Dickson, 1 Yerg. 110, 24 Am. Dec. 444.

The rule that a marriage in another state may be valid was recognized in Reed v. Hudson, 13 Ala. 570, in which parties divorced in Georgia attempted to remarry in Alabama, and the question arose as to the validity of such second marriage, and it was held valid.

If the guilty party takes up a residence in another state a marriage may be contracted, if the laws of that state permit it, which will be recognized as valid, at least in the state where it takes place. Fuller v. Fuller, 40 Ala. 301.

In a case in which defendant in the divorce proceedings was not a resident in the state, and no service of process was had on her and no actual notice of the proceedings were given to her, it was held in the state of her domicile that the decree prohibiting her remarriage had no extraterritorial effect. Van Storch v. Griffin, 71 Pa. 240.

The prohibition will not be recognized by the courts of the state to which the defendant migrates and in which he takes up his residence. Wilson v. Holt, 83 Ala. 523.

Effect in state where enacted.

In considering the effect of the statute in the state where it was enacted attention must be given to two principal dissimilarities in the circumstances under which its provisions may be disregarded. First, where the second marriage is contracted within the state of the enactment in direct violation of the statute. Second, where the second marriage occurs in another state. In the first case there is no reason why the violation of the statute should not bear whatever consequences the state may choose to provide. And the only difference between the courts is in their interpretation of the statutes and ascertainment of the penalty which has been provided.

Remarriage in state of enactment.

The tendency seems to be in case of a remarriage in the state where the prohibition exists to uphold the prohibitory statutes and give them such effect as is demanded by the end to be attained.

A statute forbidding remarriage of the guilty party with his paramour is not against public policy and will be upheld, at least to the extent of denying the alleged wife's claim to homestead in his estate. Owen v. Brackett, 7 Lea. 443.

An act prohibiting the guilty from remarrying is not ex post facto, although made to apply in cases where decrees are granted for offenses which occurred prior to the passage of the act. Elliott v. Elliott, 38 Md. 367.

But there is an intimation to the contrary in Clark v. Clark, 8 Cush. 885.

Meurs. Gilmore & Baldwin, for appellants:

Hernandez being an adulterous divorcee, and the plaintiff having committed adultery with him prior to his divorce, Hernandez's marriage to the plaintiff was, under the law of Louisiana, absolutely null and void ab initio.

Civil Code art. 161; Justinian, 134; Novel, chap. 12; Code Napoleon, art. 298; 5 Locre, p. 161.

The objects the French and our own law-makers had in view in prohibiting the spouse divorced for adultery from contracting marriage with any person with whom adultery had been committed, was to deter men and women from adultery and from divorce—from adultery by holding out the warning that an adulterous connection could never be any but an immoral and disreputable one, leading to misery and remorse; from divorce by removing the belief that such a union could be made respectable by securing the dissolution of the marriage tie.

This policy is undoubtedly better subserved by giving the restriction effect as to all accomplices than by confining it to some one accomplice mentioned in the divorce proceedings.

The marriage having been celebrated in New York, it becomes necessary to inquire whether, under the law of New York, the lex loci contractus, it was valid.

If we are to take the plain letter of the law of New York, it is clear that any person divorced for adultery, any adulterous divorcee, who marries in New York during the lifetime of his or her former spouse contracts no legal marriage.

Cropey v. Ogden, 11 N. Y. 228; Smith v. Woodworth, 44 Barb. 200; Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N. Y. 18, 40 Am. Rep. 505; Moore v. Hegeman, 92 N. Y. 527, 44 Am. Rep. 408.

Our courts in construing a foreign statute will look alone to the decisions of the courts of the state which adopted the statute for its interpretation.

Elmendorf v. Taylor, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 152, 6 L. ed. 289; Cucullu v. Louisiana Ins. Co. 5 Mart. N. S. 464, 16 Am. Dec. 199.

The more modern opinion seems to be that both as to form and capacity a marriage valid where celebrated is valid everywhere, and a marriage invalid where celebrated is invalid everywhere, subject, however, to certain exceptions.

1 Bishop, Marriage, Divorce & Separation, § 920, p. 899.

In Louisiana, however, while the general rule that the validity of a marriage is to be determined by the lex loci contractus is recognized, it has been held that where parties go abroad to evade our local statutes prohibiting their marriage, the contract is null.

The mere re-enactment of the statute in a more comprehensive form will not make the new statute unlawful in its application to offenses committed prior to its enactment. Cropey v. Ogden, 11 N. Y. 228.

Jurisdiction of defendant must be acquired in order to render the decree binding on him.

A decree cannot be granted against a nonresident who has not appeared in the action, prohibiting him from remarrying. Garner v. Garner, 56 Md. 127.

In Maguire v. Maguire, 7 Dana, 181, in which the wife of an Alabama man had gone to Kentucky and there asked for a divorce, which was granted and the husband prohibited from remarrying, the court in passing upon the validity of the decree says: "Surely the statutory declaration that the delinquent party shall never marry again without incurring the penalties denounced for bigamous connections could not have been intended to apply to husbands who had never been either citizens or domiciled residents of Kentucky, and as to whom therefore such a denunciation would be apt to be mere brutum fulmen."

But if jurisdiction has been acquired and the decree passed it is given full effect.

If the statute prohibits remarriage, an attempted marriage in the state where the decree was granted will be invalid. Cox v. Combs, 8 B. Mon. 281.

If the statute makes the second marriage a felony, no right can be based on it which will permit a recovery by the husband's administrator of property given to the wife during the pretended marriage. Calloway v. Bryan, 51 N. C. 568.

The prohibition extends even to remarriage with the one who obtained the divorce. Moore v. Moore, 8 Abb. N. C. 171.

There can be no recovery for breach of promise of marriage made by one who has been divorced, with a prohibition against marrying again in the state where the divorce was granted. Haviland v. Halstead, 84 N. Y. 643.

Where the guilty person is prohibited from marrying without leave from the court, leave granted after the contracting of the alleged marriage is ineffectual. Thompson v. Thompson, 114 Mass. 566.

In Massachusetts the legislature has no authority to legalize by special act the second marriage. White v. White, 105 Mass. 325, 7 Am. Rep. 526.

But if the one with whom the second marriage is contracted knows of the disability and continues to cohabit with the divorced person after the disability has ceased, there will be an estoppel to set up the original invalidity of the marriage. Mason v. Mason, 101 Ind. 26.

And it has been held that if the act prohibiting the guilty party from marrying again does not pronounce the second marriage void, and the guilty party is not proceeded against during his lifetime, after his death the marriage cannot be declared void for the purpose of bastardizing the children of the second marriage. Park v. Barron, 20 Ga. 702, 65 Am. Dec. 641.

In Maine and Massachusetts it has been held that the prohibitions of the statute do not apply in case of divorce granted in other states. Bullock v. Bullock, 122 Mass. 8; Clark v. Clark, 8 Cush. 386; Phillips v. Madrid, 12 L. R. A. 862, 38 Mo. 205.

But in a New York case it was held that the fact that the divorce was granted in another state is not material. The statute applies to divorces wherever granted, and forbids a second marriage by the guilty party within its territorial jurisdiction. Smith v. Woodworth, 44 Barb. 200.

The question what punishment the guilty person subjects himself to by the remarriage is not fully settled. There is some tendency to hold that the prohibitory statute must provide the punishment and that a violation of the statute does not constitute a common-law offense or bring the case within the general definitions of the common statutory crimes.

Thus it has been held that the guilty party is not guilty of adultery by contracting a second marriage. Com. v. Putnam, 1 Pick. 132.

Dupre v. Boulard, 10 La. Ann. 411; Babin v. LeBlanc, 13 La. Ann. 367; Maillefer v. Sail-Jot, 4 La. Ann. 875; Saul v. His Creditors, 5 Mart. N. S. 569, 16 Am. Dec. 212; Cabellero's Succession v. The Executor, 24 La. Ann. 573; Parsons, Cont. 6th ed. note on p. 724, § 575.

In order that ignorance of the law should constitute the basis of the good faith necessary to establish a putative marriage, it must be actual and excusable, and the party pleading it must show that all the means that law and prudence require to learn the law have been made use of.

Watkins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Originally, this suit had, for its object, recovery by Augusta L. Church, the alleged surviving widow of the deceased, of the money and movable effects of which she was donee by testamentary bequest. But the legal heirs of the deceased by a former marriage incorporated other issues in their answer, and a reconventional demand; and same were made the subject of a subsequent direct attack on the claims and pretensions of the plaintiff, which she, in turn, put at issue by answer. On these pleadings and issues there was a general judgment against the heirs, Unless the statute expressly so provides. State v. Weatherhy, 43 Me. 284, 60 Am. Dec. 69.

So an indictment for bigamy, charging a second marriage, with a former wife living, is not supported by proof of a second marriage after the first wife had obtained a divorce. Com. v. Richardson, 126 Mass. 34, 30 Am. Rep. 647.

But in Graves v. Graves, 2 Paige, 62, 2 L. ed. 513, the chancellor intimated an opinion that defendant would be guilty of felony if he married again.

And in a later New York case it was held that contracting a second marriage in the state where the divorce was granted renders the guilty person guilty of bigamy. People v. Faber, 22 N. Y. 146, 44 Am. Rep. 357.

Although the contrary doctrine had been held by the supreme court in the earlier case of People v. Hovey, 5 Barb. 117.

In Park v. Barron, 20 Ga. 702, 65 Am. Dec. 641, the court said obiter "by marrying the second time, the wife who procured the divorce being still alive, the divorced husband subjected himself to the pains and penalties enacted against bigamy." His offense was bigamy, but not bigamy as defined in the penal code; for the marriage having been dissolved he had no wife; so that on the second marriage he had not a plurality of wives. Yet, if he had been indicted and the state had proved the first marriage and that the woman to whom he was united in marriage was still alive, and then the second marriage, a case of bigamy would have been made out against which defendant would not have been permitted to prove the decree dissolving the first marriage.

Marrying in another state and returning to state of prohibition.

The question here is one of some difficulty. In its solution a conflict of principles is encountered. On the one hand the rule is that a marriage good where contracted is good everywhere. Of course that rule has some exceptions, but they have not been regarded as sufficient to take this class of cases out of the rule. On the other hand a state ought to have power to enforce its penal ordinances of which it could not be deprived by a mere colorable evasion of them.

A state ought to have control of the status of its subjects and many perplexing questions regarding marriage and divorce would disappear if a general rule were adopted that no state should interfere with or change the status of citizens of another state. In this particular case the rule was that the validity of the contract should be determined by the law of the state, where the parties established their residence immediately after the marriage instead of by that of the place where the contract happened to be made, most of the difficulty would vanish. There could be no more fraudulent evasion of law bringing it into contempt and scandalizing the community. No general rule can, however, be drawn from the decided cases.

There is less difficulty if the parties acquire a domicile in another state.

If, after the decree, the party prohibited from remarrying takes up his residence in another state where he contracts a second marriage, legal under its laws, such marriage will be treated as valid after his death in the state where the decree was granted, so far at least as to entitle the second wife and the issue of the marriage to a share of his estate. Re Webb's Estate, Tucker, 372.

The state in which the divorce decree was passed will treat the children of a marriage entered into in another state as legitimate, for the purpose of determining the place of their settlement. West Cambridge v. Lexington, 1 Pick. 505, 11 Am. Dec. 231.

The second marriage in another state may be so far recognized as to render the children legitimate. Moore v. Hegeman, 27 Hun, 68, 92 N. Y. 527, 44 Am. Rep. 408.

But when the second marriage is a mere evasion of the prohibitory laws the decisions are less satisfactory.

The fact that the guilty husband goes to another state for the purpose of evading the prohibition and in favor of the original plaintiff and donee, and the heirs have appealed.

1. The will of the deceased is of the following tenor, viz.: "New Orleans, December 27th, 1890. This is my olographic will. I give and bequeath to my wife, Augusta L. Church, all the movable effects contained in our house, corner Bordeaux and St. Charles avenue, with the exception of the family paintings, which I give to my son Charles,—he to divide them with his brother and sister. I also give and bequeath to my wife the sum of ten thousand dollars. The balance of my estate I bequeath to my children, share and share alike. I appoint as my executors my wife and my son Charles; they to have full charge of my estate, without giving any bonds. [Signed] J. Hernandez."

The grounds on which the heirs attack the testamentary bequest in favor of the plaintiff are best stated in the language of their answer and reconventional demand, and in that of their petition attacking plaintiff's capacity to receive by will, and the legality of her title to a community half interest in the property left at the demise of the decedent. The following is an extract from their answer, viz.: "That a final judgment was rendered and signed on the 4th of October, 1891, or about that time, in the suit entitled Joseph Hernandez v. Rosema D'Aunoy, his wife, No. 70 of the docket of the 24th judicial district court for the parish of St. Bernard, in favor of the defendant in said suit; and, on her demand in reconvention therein, against the said plaintiff, Joseph Hernandez, decreeing a separation from bed and board, and a final divorce a vinculo matrimonii, dissolving forever the bonds of matrimony existing between them, as is shown by a duly certified copy of said judgment, herewith filed, and made a part of this answer, marked 'Exhibit A.' That the aforesaid judgment was rendered, and the divorce therein granted allowed, in favor of the said Rosema D'Aunoy, wife of said Joseph Hernandez, and against her said husband, on the ground of adultery. That the petitioner herein, now styling herself as Mistress Augusta Lodoiska Church, widow in community of Joseph Hernandez, deceased, but, in times past styling herself as Mistress Ogden and as Mistress Ida Curtis, was the chief accomplice in adultery with the said Joseph Hernandez, and, at various times and places anterior to the rendition of the aforesaid judgment of divorce, had illicit sexual intercourse with the said Joseph Hernandez, viz., in 1879, 1880, and 1881, and in other years prior thereto, in the city of New York, at the St. James Hotel and elsewhere, and in the city of New Orleans, at the St. Charles Hotel and elsewhere, time and time again. That owing to the said judgment of divorce granted as aforesaid in favor of Mistress Rosema D'Aunoy, wife of said Joseph Hernandez, against her husband, and on account of said petitioner's complicity in adultery with said Joseph Hernandez, the said petitioner and the said Joseph Hernandez became, forever, legally incapable of contracting marriage with each other, and the so-called marriage relied on by petitioner, if ever contracted, which is herein specially denied, was, is, always has against his marrying again will not make the marriage void as against an innocent person whom he marries, so as to deprive her of her rights in his estate after his decease. Pondsford v. Johnson, 2 Blatchf. 51. In that case the court says that the prohibition against a second marriage was merely a penalty which attached to the person of the guilty party only in the state providing it.

The marriage will be treated as valid for the purpose of determining the second wife's rights to dower, although the guilty party left the state for the express purpose of evading the effect of the prohibition. Putnam v. Putnam, 8 Pick. 433.

Although the parties go out of the state for the purpose of evading its laws, children of the marriage will be held legitimate by the courts of the state where the divorce was granted, if the parties return there to live. Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N. Y. 13, 40 Am. Rep. 505.

The guilty party does not, by marrying in another state and returning to live in the state of the divorce, become subject to indictment for lewd and lascivious behavior. Com. v. Hunt, 4 Cush. 49. In Massachusetts the person violating the prohibition is not guilty of bigamy, unless it is shown that the second wife was a resident of the state and that the parties went into the other state for the purpose of evading the local laws. Com. v. Lane, 118 Mass. 453.

The New York statute does not authorize the court to declare void a marriage in another state, although the parties went to such state to avoid the provisions of the statutes of the state of divorce. Peugnet v. Phelps, 43 Barb. 598.

The fact that the guilty party disobeyed the decree of divorce by marrying in another state will not prevent his maintaining an action in the courts of the state which granted the divorce to 24 L. R. A.

dissolve the second marriage. Thorp v. Thorp, 90 N. Y. 602, 48 Am. Rep. 189.

But in an earlier case it had been held that while the guilty party is in contempt by going into another state and there marrying, he will have no standing in the courts of the state granting the original divorce to maintain a suit against his second wife for a divorce. Marshall v. Marshall, 2 Hun. 238, 48 How. Pr. 57, 4 Thomp. & C. 449.

For the purpose of shielding himself from the consequences of a third marriage, one indicted for bigamy will not be permitted to insist on the invalidity of a second marriage contracted in another state after his first wife had procured a divorce which prohibited him from remarrying. People v. Chase, 23 Hun. 810.

If a woman goes out of the state to marry a man prohibited by the laws from marrying, for the purpose of evading such laws, she will not be granted relief from the marriage on the ground of its invalidity, for the reason that she is equally guilty for the evasion of the statutes. Kerrierson v. Kerrierson, 8 Abb. N. C. 444.

Some of the states refuse to tolerate an evasion of their laws.

If the parties go into another state for the purpose of evading the laws of the state where the divorce was granted and then return there to live, they may be convicted of lewdness. Pennegar v. State, 2 L. R. A. 708, 87 Tenn. 244.

A marriage contracted in another state in fraud of the laws of the state where the decree was granted will not be recognized in the latter state. Williams v. Oates, 27 N. C. 535.

Violation of the statute will invalidate the second marriage in the state where the divorce was granted. Taylor's Succession, 39 La. Ann. 825.

been, and always will be, absolutely null and void, and without any lawful force or effect. Further answering, these respondents say that no community of acquets and gains ever existed between the said petitioner and the said Joseph Hernandez; that said petitioner never had any right, title, interest, or claim in or to any of the property, real, personal, or mixed, appertaining or belonging to the estate of the late Joseph Hernandez; that the so-called legacy of ten thousand dollars and the so-called legacy of the movable effects in the residence of the said Joseph Hernandez, at the corner of St. Charles avenue and Bordeaux street, in this city, claimed by petitioner in her aforesaid petition, were and are unlawful, and without any force or effect, and should be so decreed and held by the judgment of this honorable court. Respondents, further answering, show that immediately after the aforesaid judgment of divorce was rendered and executed the said Joseph Hernandez had held and owned not less than two hundred thousand dollars ($200,000), real and personal property, and at the date of his death, in April, 1893, all that could then be found, and all that has since been discovered, of his entire estate, will not equal in value the sum of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000); that from 1881 to April, 1893, the said Joseph Hernandez was living openly with the said petitioner, Mistress Augusta Lodoiska Church, as man and wife, notwithstanding the prohibition aforesaid, which inhibited them from living in that way, and from ever contracting the marriage relationship; that during the period aforesaid—that is, since 1881—a large portion of the estate of the said Joseph Hernandez has been illegally wasted and lavished upon the aforesaid petitioner, owing to her unlawful and undue influence over the said deceased, and the diminution of said estate has been largely occasioned by petitioner's extravagant living, and by the many large and unlawful gifts and presents and transfers which the said petitioner illegally obtained from the said Joseph Hernandez; that the so-called legacy of ten thousand dollars ($10,000), and the so-called legacy of the movables in the residence of the said deceased, claimed as aforesaid by petitioner, composes more than one third of the entire estate of said Joseph Hernandez so far discovered. That by law the said testator could not, under any circumstances, have lawfully given the said petitioner more than one tenth part of the movables of his estate, which portion, and more, the said deceased had long before disposed of, in favor of petitioner, by gift, donation, and otherwise. And these respondents, further answering, say that for the foregoing and other reasons the said petitioner is not entitled to said so-called legacies, or either of them, nor can she have possession or delivery of the same, as claimed in her petition or otherwise; that the gifts, transfers, and donations made by the said Joseph Hernandez to petitioner at various times exceeded fifty thousand dollars, and more than exhausted his ability and power to give or bequeath anything to petitioner by his last will and testament; that all the provisions of said last will containing bequests in favor of petitioner should therefore be canceled, and decreed and held illegal, null, and void. And now reconvening, and becoming plaintiffs in reconvention, respondents pray for judgment on the original demand therein, in their favor, and against petitioner; and, upon the demand in reconvention, appearers pray for judgment in their favor, and against the said Mistress Augusta Lodoiska Church, illegally styling herself 'widow in community of the late Joseph Hernandez,' for fifty thousand dollars ($50,000), or for so much thereof as will be shown on the trial of this cause to have been illegally given, transferred, or disposed of, in favor of said petitioner, by said Joseph Hernandez, and that all such unlawful gifts and transfers may be annulled. And reconvenors further pray for a judgment decreeing the alleged marriage between petitioner and the said Joseph Hernandez to be, and to have always been, an absolute nullity, and without any legal force or effect."

Several months subsequent to the filing this answer, the heirs filed a petition making a direct demand for the annulment of the legacy on the same averments of illegality of the marriage of the plaintiff with their father, and praying for a personal judgment against her for the sum of $50,000, approximately. As the language of this petition is somewhat more comprehensive than the answer of the heirs, and the charges against the plaintiff are somewhat more elaborated and intensified, we will reproduce the following extracts, namely: "Petitioners further show that the said judgment granting a divorce in favor of said Rosema D'Aunoy against her said husband, Joseph Hernandez, on the ground of his adultery, and the complicity of the defendant herein in adultery with the said Joseph Hernandez as aforesaid, constituted a fixed, absolute, and perpetual barrier to any marriage between the said Joseph Hernandez and the defendant herein.

That if any marriage was ever contracted between the said Joseph Hernandez and the defendant herein, which petitioners specially deny, said so-called marriage was entered into in bad faith on part of said defendant, and in violation of prohibitory laws, and was, is, always has been and ever will be, absolutely null and void. Petitioners further show that, as there never was any legal marriage between the late Joseph Hernandez and the defendant herein, there was not, and never could have been, any community of acquets and gains between them, and said defendant has not, and never has had, any community rights nor claims whatsoever in or to any of the assets or properties, real, personal, or mixed, appertaining or belonging to the estate of the late Joseph Hernandez." In order to be explicit, we reproduce the prayer of the defendants' petition, namely: "Wherefore, petitioners pray that Mistress Augusta Lodoiska Church, illegally claiming to be widow in community of the late Joseph Hernandez, be cited to appear and answer this petition, and, after due proceedings had, judgment be rendered in favor of petitioners, and against said defendant, decreasing said defendant never to have been the wife nor the widow, in community or otherwise, of the late Joseph Hernandez; furthermore, annulling all bequests contained in the last will and testament of the late Joseph Hernandez in favor of the said defendant, and ordering the entire estate of the late Joseph Hernandez to be distributed among his forced heirs as their interests may appear, regardless of any bequests contained in said will in favor of said defendant; furthermore, decreeing that all the movables and other properties inventoried in this estate be held and adjudged to have belonged exclusively to the said Joseph Hernandez, and to his aforesaid surviving forced heirs, and condemning the said defendant to pay back to this estate fifty thousand dollars ($50,000), or so much thereof as will be shown on the trial of this cause to have been illegally given, transferred, or disposed of by said Joseph Hernandez to or in favor of said defendant, and that all such unlawful donations, gifts, and transfers be annulled. And, if it be shown that the contract of marriage was ever solemnized between defendant and said Joseph Hernandez, then and in that event that judgment be rendered herein decreeing said marriage to have been always an absolute nullity, and without legal force or effect."

In answer to these charges, the original plaintiff, the alleged surviving widow of Hernandez, states and "averts that she was legally married to the late Joseph Hernandez on the 29th of December, 1881, in the city of New York, by the mayor of said city, and under the laws of that state, and that no impediment of any kind existed against said marriage, either at the time of its celebration, or before; that the charges preferred by the petition of complicity in adultery with the said Joseph Hernandez are false and untrue, and no judgment to that effect was ever rendered, nor was respondent party to any proceeding in which said issue was asserted or maintained; that the petitioners have, ever since her marriage, acknowledged the validity of the same, visited the common domicile daily, and have recognized respondent as the lawful wife of said Hernandez, and they are now estopped from denying the validity of said marriage; that respondent owned, in her own name, when she married the said Joseph Hernandez, property amounting to not less than twenty-five thousand dollars, consisting of money, jewelry, paintings, carriages, furniture, table and bed linen, and household effects; that petitioners are estopped from denying the truth and reality of the acts of purchase by respondent of the two pieces of immovable property situated in the parish of St. Tammany, in this state, in which acts of purchase the said Joseph Hernandez acknowledged and declared that the price was paid with the paraphernal funds of your respondent. Wherefore, respondent prays that plaintiffs' demand be dismissed, with costs, and that there be judgment in favor of respondent, decreeing that she was lawfully married to Joseph Hernandez; that the legacy he made her in his last will is valid and legal, and 24 L. R. A.

should be paid to her; that she be recognized as entitled to half of the community property left by him; and that her paraphernal rights be recognized and decreed for such amount, and specific effects and things, as she may prove herself entitled to on the trial of this cause."

These extended extracts from the pleadings best serve to characterize the controversies in this case, and fix the mind of the court on the questions that are to be solved by testimony, much of which was received over objection.

2. The foundation of the attack of the Hernandez heirs upon the claims of the alleged surviving widow depend, primarily and mainly, upon a proper construction of article 161 of the Revised Civil Code, the text of which is as follows, viz.: "In case of divorce on the ground of adultery, the guilty party can never contract matrimony with his or her accomplice in adultery, under the penalty of being considered and prosecuted as guilty of the crime of bigamy; and under penalty of nullity of the new marriage." The contention of the heirs is that the denunciation of that article against the marriage of the guilty party with his or her accomplice in adultery is matter in pais, to be determined by the administration of proof on the trial of a suit that involves the validity of the marriage, while that of the plaintiff is that it is against the marriage of the guilty party named in the divorce suit as an accomplice, or particeps criminis, in the adultery charged as the cause of the action, whether such accomplice be made a co-respondent or not. Hence, upon the determination of the correctness of these contentions, pro et con, depends the admissibility of the large volume of evidence found in the record; and upon the construction of the cited article of the code mainly depends the legality of the marriage of Joseph Hernandez with plaintiff on the 29th of November, 1881.

The proofs principally relied upon by plaintiff are the following, to wit: "(1) The last will of the late Joseph Hernandez. (2) The certificate of marriage, issued from the office of the mayor of New York, certifying that the ceremony between Mr. Joseph Hernandez and Mrs. Augusta L. Odgen, of Paris, France, was performed by the mayor of New York on the 29th of December, 1881, at his office in said city. (3) Volume 3 of the Revised Statutes of New York (7th ed.) tit. 1, art. 1, par. 8, at page 2332, for the purpose of showing the mayor's authority to celebrate a marriage. (4) Her testimony to the effect that the Augusta L. Odgen named in said marriage certificate was the same person as herself."

"The fundamental facts on which the forced heirs of the late Joseph Hernandez rely to overthrow the demands of Mrs. A. L. Church for a delivery of her aforesaid legacy, and on which they have sought, and are still endeavoring, to annul the same, and to have her aforesaid marriage decreed to be without any legal force or effect, are: (1) The divorce granted Mrs. Rosema D'Aunoy, wife of Joseph Hernandez, by the district court of the parish of St. Bernard, on the 4th of October, 1881, on the ground of adultery; and (2) complicity in adultery on the part of Augusta L. Church with said Joseph Hernandez during his marriage with Rosema D'Aunoy."

In support of the foregoing charges, defendants made the following proofs, viz.:

First. The record, and pertinent facts therewith connected, in the suit entitled Joseph Hernandez v. His Wife, No. 70 on the docket of the twenty-fourth judicial district court, parish of St. Bernard. (a) The aforesaid suit was directed against Rosema D'Aunoy, as the wife of plaintiff, claiming a divorce a vinculo matrimonii on various grounds, which it is needless to mention. The record of this suit was lost or destroyed by the fire which burned the court-house on the 2d of March, 1884, as is stated in the certificate of the clerk, which is appended to the copy of the minutes of the court,—same alone surviving the fire. (b) The testimony of the presiding judge and the lawyers engaged in the trial of the case was taken with the view of establishing the purport of the pleadings, evidence, and judgment pronounced therein. The judge states his recollection to be that the defendant charged adultery on the part of her husband, and asked judgment of divorce accordingly; that several witnesses were examined; and that the charge of adultery on the part of the husband was fully established, but with what particular person he cannot remember. But he further amplifies his statement thus: "I have stated all I remember of this case, in the above answer. I cannot state whether the pleadings set forth the name of the person or persons with whom Hernandez was charged with having committed adultery. My impression is that the evidence established that he visited houses of assignation, and committed adultery with prostitutes." The statement of the attorney who brought that suit is: That no one was named as co respondent, and no one was named or specified as the person or persons with whom the plaintiff had committed adultery, on the faith of which the defendant's reconventional demand was made. That his recollection is that the evidence was not reduced to writing. He remembers that one witness stated, substantially, that he knew of two instances wherein Mr. Hernandez had committed adultery. He states positively that "no witness specified any particular person with whom Mr. Hernandez had committed adultery, and no one stated that he had committed adultery with one Mistress Augusta L. Church, sometimes called Augusta Ogden, and sometimes called Augusta L. Curtis. To the best of his recollection, the name of Mistress Church, Mistress Ogden, or Mistress Curtis was not mentioned on the trial." That "he remembers no evidence introduced on the trial of the cause for divorce tending to show that Mr. Hernandez was guilty of adultery with his second wife, Mrs. A. L. Hernandez, nor anything in the judgment of divorce fixing the guilt of adultery upon the said Mistress A. L. Church, now the widow of Joseph Hernandez."

The testimony of a prominent lawyer who was connected with the case is best evidenced by the following, viz.: "Q. Were you present in the district court of St. Bernard parish on the day when the cause of Hernandez against his wife for a divorce was tried? A. I was. Q. Did you see at the time, or previously, the pleadings in that case? A. I did. Q. Do you remember at this date who was the party named as the accomplice, or guilty person in the adultery there charged by the wife against the husband? A. My memory is that there was no person named. My memory of the suit is that it was a suit by Mr. Hernandez against his wife for a divorce; she reconvening, and claiming a divorce from him on the ground of adultery. Q. I believe your memory is correct. You heard the evidence administered in support of the charge of adultery? A. I did, sir. Q. Do you remember the name of the witness who was examined? A. Yes, I do, sir. Q. What is it? A. L. E. Lemarie. Q. Did he, or did he not, give any testimony implicating Mrs. Augusta L. Curtis,—the present Mrs. Hernandez? A. None in the world sir."

The witness last named was placed upon the stand as a witness in this case, and his statement is in keeping with the testimony of the witness last quoted from: "Q. Have you no recollection of having mentioned any one in your testimony that you gave on the trial of that cause? A. I don't think I have. I don't think the question was asked me."

One of the attorneys who represented the defendant in the suit examined as a witness and produced and filed in evidence, in connection with his evidence, a copy of the defendant's answer and reconventional demand, which is of the following tenor, viz.: "Joseph Hernandez v. His Wife, No. 70. 24th Judicial District Court, Parish of St. Bernard. The answer of defendant herein denies generally each and every allegation in the plaintiff's petition contained, except the fact of marriage and community of property; and now, assuming the character of plaintiff in reconvention, she avers that her said husband, forgetting alike his vows and marriage with petitioner, did commit adultery with certain females, at various times and places, in this city, since the 21st of April, 1880, the full particulars and specifications whereof have been served in writing upon defendant, and same are made part hereof; and that by reason thereof, and the law, your petitioner is entitled to a final divorce. Wherefore, she prays judgment in her favor on the demand of plaintiff, and in her favor on the reconventional demand against her husband, Joseph Hernandez, decreeing a separation from bed and board, and final divorce a vinculo matrimonii, forever dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between them; that a separation of property be decreed; and that——, notary public, be appointed to partition the community property. And she prays for all such further aid, relief, and remedy as the court is competent to give in the premises. [Signed] W. B. Benedict and E. North Cullom, Attorneys." The counsel's attention having been attracted to the phrase we have italicized, namely, "the full particulars and specifications whereof having been served in writing upon the defendant, and made a part hereof," the following question was propounded, and answer given, viz.: "Q. In the copy of the answer that you have referred to in your testimony as having been filed in the case, mention is made of particulars and specifications served in writing upon the defendant, and made a part of that answer. Have you a copy of those specifications? A. There were none filed. Q. There were none? A. There were none filed with the answer." His remembrance of the facts detailed on the trial of that case is much the same as that of other witnesses. The exceptions filed related exclusively to the jurisdiction of the court, and same were overruled.

Notwithstanding the destruction by fire of the original records, the minutes of the court in that case were fortunately preserved; and they contain the judgment of the court, regularly signed, and which is of the following tenor, to wit: "Extract from the minutes of October 4th, 1881: The court met this day, pursuant to adjournment. Present: The Hon. A. E. Livaudais, Judge. Joseph Hernandez v. Rosema D'Aunoy Wife. No. 70. The expert herein appointed, Edgar H. Farrar, this day appeared in open court, and presented his report, which was ordered filed, and made a part of the record of this case; and this case, being regularly filed, came up for trial on its merits. Present: A. G. Brice, attorney for plaintiff, and W. S. Benedict and E. North Cullom, of counsel for defendant. When, after hearing pleadings, evidence, and counsel, and the report of the expert herein appointed, the court considering the law and the evidence to be in favor of defendant on the plaintiff's demand, and in favor of the defendant on her reconventional demand and against the plaintiff, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that there be judgment herein, on plaintiff's demand, in favor of the defendant, Rosema D'Aunoy, and against Joseph Hernandez, plaintiff, with costs. And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that on the reconventional demand there be judgment herein in favor of Rosema D'Aunoy, wife of Joseph Hernandez, and against the said Joseph Hernandez, her husband, decreeing a separation from bed and board between the said parties, and a final divorce, a vinculo matrimonii, forever dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between them. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the rights of the said Rosema D'Aunoy, wife of Joseph Hernandez, against her husband, Joseph Hernandez, resulting from the community of acquets and gains lately existing between them, be fixed and determined in the sum of fifty-five thousand dollars, and that, in accordance therewith, there be judgment in favor of Rosema D'Aunoy, wife of Joseph Hernandez, and against her said husband, in said sum of fifty five thousand dollars, with legal interest from date, with all costs. . . . Judgment rendered and signed in open court this 4th day of October, 1881. [Signed] A. E. Livaudais, Judge 24th Judicial District Court of Louisiana."

The foregoing résumé of the record and evidence in the divorce suit fully and conclusively demonstrates that the action was not grounded on any charge of adultery in which the present plaintiff was alleged or shown to have been a participant; and, on the plaintiff's theory of the law, she was not an accomplice in the adultery of which the plaintiff in that case was proven guilty,—the purport of the defendants' charge against her being, "that owing to the judgment of divorce granted, as aforesaid, in favor of Mrs. Rosema D'Aunoy, wife of said Joseph Hernandez, against her said husband, and on account of said petitioner's complicity in adultery with the said Joseph Hernandez, the said petitioner and the said Joseph Hernandez became forever legally incapable of contracting marriage with each other; and the so-called marriage relied on by petitioner, if ever contracted, which is herein specially denied, was, is, always has been, and always will be, absolutely null and void, and without any lawful force or effect." The italics are ours.

At this stage of the proceedings the defendants offered evidence alunde to prove that the plaintiff had committed adultery with Hernandez at different times and places, for the purpose and with the object of establishing the fact that, on their theory, she was his accomplice in adultery, in the sense, and within the denunciation, of the code. To this evidence, counsel for the plaintiff objected, on the following grounds, viz.: "First, that no proof was admissible beyond the scope of the allegations, which claimed the nullity of the marriage exclusively on the ground that the judgment in the divorce suit of Rosema D'Aunoy had established the adultery of Joseph Hernandez with Augusta L. Church; and, secondly, that the prohibition of marriage between the guilty spouse and his accomplice in adultery, as provided for in article 161 of the Code, applies only to the accomplice decreed as such in a divorce suit, and on account of whose adultery with the guilty spouse the judgment of divorce is rendered." An attentive and careful consideration of the pleadings of the defendants, as a whole, does not disclose that the nullity of the marriage, exclusively, is rested on the finding of the court to the effect that Hernandez had been guilty of adultery with the plaintiff. Consequently, the first rule of exclusion urged is not good, and in this respect the ruling of the judge a quo was correct.

But the second ground for the exclusion of the evidence offered is serious, and requires careful consideration. What is the meaning and significance of the words of the article, "In case of divorce, on account of adultery, the guilty party can never contract marriage with his or her accomplice in adultery?" Does it mean an accomplice in the particular adultery of which the guilty party is charged, and on which the suit for divorce is predicated and decided? Or does it mean an accomplice in any adultery, with any one, antecedent to the institution of the divorce suit, regardless of whether she is the person named or contemplated in the suit, or not? The answer of plaintiff's counsel to the foregoing query is found so well stated in their brief that we extract the most pertiment portion, as the best mode of presenting it. It is as follows, viz.: "We see, first, that it is only in case of divorce that a subsequent marriage is prohibited between the guilty spouse and his accomplice. The prohibition does not apply if the first marriage was dissolved by death. The guilty spouse surviving could clearly marry his accomplice in adultery, inasmuch as no law forbids it, and penal statutes cannot be extended by implication. We find this well explained in 10 Merlin on Repertoire de Jurisprudence, p. 216, verbo 'Empêchement de Mariage.' He gives there, also, the origin of this prohibition. It was taken from the Roman law by the Catholic Church. The subsequent marriage with the accomplice was only prohibited when the adultery was committed under a promise of marriage. But, says Merlin: 'The Civil Code is more severe: it provides (art. 298) that, "in the case of divorce on account of adultery, the guilty spouse can never marry his accomplice."' Thus, in order to create the prohibition, it is no more necessary that the promise of marriage should concur with the adultery. But—let us observe it well—this provision is limited to the case where the adultery has been followed by a divorce. There could be, therefore, no opposition to the marriage of a widow with a man with whom it would be pretended that she had lived in adultery during her marriage; such a proof would not be admissible." (The italics are ours.) A comparison with the text of the article 298 of the Code Napoleon proves the correctness of the foregoing quotation.

In Locre's Commentary on the French Code, title "Of Divorce," he says: "That the wife against whom the divorce has been pronounced for this cause [adultery] is incapable of contracting a new marriage." 5 Locre, p. 161. "That the husband against whom the divorce has been pronounced for cause of adultery will not be incapable of contracting a second marriage, if it is not with his concubine." Id. "The adulterous husband will never be able to marry afterwards with his accomplice. He should not be able to find, by and through the judgment which condemns him, a title and instrumentality to satisfy a guilty passion." Id. p. 311, § 38. This author is in full accord with the views of other French commentators, who hold that the reason for the prohibition is that the guilty party should not be allowed to procure a divorce for the purpose of marrying his accomplice; or, in other words, the effect of the judgment releasing him from his marriage covenant, ought not to furnish him immunity from his crime, by permitting him afterwards to contract a new marriage, with the particeps criminis in the adultery of which he has been convicted. 2 Laurent, p. 478, § 387; 1 Toulhier, p. 465; 2 Duranton, p. 124, § 177; 8 Demolombe, pp. 165, 167; 1 Marcadé, p. 599. By a comparison, it will appear that the language of the Code Napoleon is almost identical with that of our Civil Code. The Legislature of 1837 incorporated into the body of our law the provisions of the Code Napoleon, in the following phraseology, viz.: 24 L. R. A.

"That in cases of divorce on account of adultery, the guilty party can never contract matrimony with his or her accomplice in the adultery, under the penalty of being considered and prosecuted as guilty of the crime of bigamy and under the penalty of nullity of the new marriage." Act Relative to Divorces, § 10, p. 180. This statute was re-enacted in 1855 without any other change or modification than the omission of the word "the" which occurs in the original text just before the word "adultery." Act 807 of 1855, § 8. Counsel for the defendants refer to this omission from the Act of 1855—which is identical in terms with article 161 of the Code—of the article "the," as significant of legislative purpose on the question, and they employ this language, viz.: "Be that as it may, the fact that when, in 1855, the present article 161 of our Code was adopted, the word 'the' was omitted, shows, beyond all doubt, that if our legislature, in 1827, did intend to restrict the bar to marriage between the divorced spouse and his accomplice to any one accomplice, or any one set of accomplices, that it abandoned the policy, and, in its wisdom, made the law conform to the Code Napoleon, except in this: that, while the French law is only mandatory, ours renders the marriage null."

The question presented is apparently res nova in our jurisprudence; no pertinent decision of this court, or of the court of cassation, having been cited on either side. True it is that counsel for defendants have referred to and quoted from several cases, and notably the following, viz.: Dupre v. Boulard, 10 La. Ann. 411; Minvielle's Succession, 15 La. Ann. 342; Summerlin v. Livingston, Id. 520; Caballero's Succession v. His Executor, 24 La. Ann. 573; Colwell's Succession, 34 La. Ann. 286. But all of those cases treat of the nullity of marriages between white and colored persons, which was prohibited by the terms of article 95 of the Code of 1825, which was expunged from the Revised Code of 1870, which, for the first time, embodied the present article 161. Therefore, those cases bear no analogy to the question under consideration. But Taylor's Succession, 89 La. Ann. 825, points in a direction opposite that of defendants' view. From the statement of the case, it appears that J. C. Taylor married Miss Sarah Castleberry in 1852, and in 1865 they voluntarily separated, and thereafter lived apart. In 1866 Mrs. Sarah C. Taylor sued her husband for a divorce on the ground of adultery, but judgment went against her. In December of that year, Taylor and Widow McFarland were married in the state of Arkansas, and thereafter they lived and cohabited together. In 1867 Mrs. S. C. Taylor renewed her suit against Taylor for a divorce, grounding her demand upon the alleged adulterous life he was then leading with his pretended wife under the Arkansas marriage ceremony; and, in the month of November of that year, judgment was rendered in her favor, granting her a full divorce against Taylor. In the case under consideration, the children of the marriage of Taylor and Widow McFarland sought to obtain a share in their father's estate, and the children of the marriage of Taylor with Miss Castleberry resisted their claims, invoking the nullity of the marriage, on the authority of article 161, Revised Code. Of this controversy the court said: "We conclude from the record that Mrs. McFarland's conduct in marrying Taylor, in Arkansas, in December, 1866, was not characterized by good faith, in law, and that, in cohabiting with him thereafter, she became his accomplice in adultery," and therefore their marriage was void. In that case the wife, suing for and obtaining a judgment of divorce, alleged that her husband had committed adultery with the identical person with whom he had been living, and the proof on the trial sustained the charge. Hence she was, in the sense of article 161, his accomplice in the adultery. That case appears to confirm the theory of the plaintiff, though it possesses two features which distinguish it from the instant case, and they are (1) that Taylor married Mrs. McFarland before he was divorced from his legal wife, while Hernandez was not married until after he was divorced from his first wife; and (2) that in the Taylor Case the accomplice was named, though in the Hernandez suit she was not. Independent of the support which that decision brings to the plaintiff's theory, the rule of our jurisprudence is that in a suit for divorce, grounded on a charge of adultery, the plaintiff must specially mention the person with whom the adultery has been committed, and full particulars of time and place must be given, so as to put the defendant on his guard, though it is not necessary that such person should be formally cited to answer as a co-respondent. As an illustration of that rule the following cases may be cited namely: Compton v. Compton, 9 La. Ann. 499; Suberville v. Adams, 46 La. Ann. 119. This precept of jurisprudence seems to have been followed in the Taylor Case, 89 La. Ann. 825. Not only is this theory in accord with correct rules of judicial procedure and pleading, but they comport with the principles of article 161 of the Code, which manifestly indicates the necessity of the accomplice being named and disclosed, as the means of enforcing its behests. If this were not so, grave and serious injury might result, and the rights of inheritance, the legitimacy of children, and the security of marital rights, as well as the title to property, would be imperiled by the uncertainty and insecurity of the tenure; depending as it would, upon the uncertain recollection of witnesses, long years after the occurrences had happened. Who could be an accomplice of the guilty party, other than the person with whom the adultery was committed? To constitute the defendant in a divorce suit a "guilty party," the proof must show that he has committed adultery with some one, for if the proof does not establish his guilt, the divorce cannot be granted. If, indeed, the defendant had been engaged in promiscuous sexual intercourse with sundry persons, and these facts were not disclosed by proof on the trial of the divorce suit, he could not, in respect to such transactions, be considered a guilty party, and consequently the persons with whom such undisclosed adulteries had been committed could not possibly be deemed accomplices, in the sense of the code; for to be an accomplice necessarily presupposes a principal, whose guilt has been established, and in whose guilt she is a particeps criminis.

On mature reflection, and a careful examination of all the authorities bearing on the question, we have reached the conclusion that the plaintiff's second objection was well taken, and should have been sustained by the judge a quo, and the testimony that is covered by it rejected and excluded. The conclusion that necessarily results is that Hernandez was under no legal disability to enter into a contract of marriage with the plaintiff, resulting as a consequence of the judgment of divorce, albeit the same was grounded on a charge of adultery; that is, if the marriage ceremony had been performed in the state of Louisiana. We are therefore dispensed from making an examination of the previous divorce proceedings, and the judgment of dismissal thereof, and the resulting effect of the estoppel and res adjudicata pleaded, as well as of the parol proof of adultery vel non between the plaintiff and Hernandez prior to the institution of the last suit for divorce.

8. It remains for the court to consider the legal effect of the contract of marriage which the plaintiff entered into with Hernandez in the city and state of New York, and we are to determine whether the contracting parties thereby came under the denunciation of the New York statute which prohibits the second marriage of persons who have been divorced because of adultery during the lifetime of the former husband or wife. The following is a literal copy of the New York marriage certificate, viz.: "State of New York, City and County of New York. I, W. R. Grace, mayor of the city of New York, do hereby certify that on the 29th of December, 1881, at the mayor's office, I duly performed the marriage ceremony between Mr. Joseph Hernandez, of New Orleans, La., and Mrs. Augusta L. Ogden, of Paris, France; that the said parties were satisfactorily made known to me, and were of lawful age to contract marriage; and that, upon due inquiry by me made, there appeared no legal impediment to said marriage. I further certify that the following persons, C. H. Woodman and C. G. Crocker, were present, and became subscribing witnesses to said marriage. [Signed] W. R. Grace, Mayor. [Seal affixed]." The following is the section of the Revised Statutes of New York, the prohibition of which the defendants' counsel invoked, viz.: "Section 5 of the Revised Statutes of New York (Birdseye's ed.), p. 1401, reads as follows: 'No second or other subsequent marriage shall be contracted by any person during the lifetime of any former husband or wife of such person, unless (1) the marriage with such former husband or wife shall have been annulled or dissolved for some cause other than the adultery of such person, or (2) unless such former husband and wife shall have been finally sentenced to imprisonment for life. Every marriage contracted in violation of the provisions of this section shall, except in the case provided for in the next section, be absolutely void." On this state of facts the defendants' counsel contend that the terms of the New York statute include within its prohibition all persons divorced, whether under the law of Louisiana or that of New York, because of adultery, and render them incapacitated to enter into a contract of marriage in New York, notwithstanding they have their residence in Louisiana at the time. On the contrary, the contention of the plaintiff's counsel is to the effect that the law of New York, being a penal statute, can have no extraterritorial effect, and therefore cannot annul a contract of marriage between persons residing abroad, though solemnized in that state. The question for this court to decide is whether the plaintiff's marriage celebrated in New York was valid; Hernandez having been divorced by a judgment of a Louisiana court, because of adultery,—his divorced wife still living.

Not only does the marriage certificate show that Hernandez at the time resided in Louisiana, and Mrs. Augusta L. Ogden resided in Paris, France, but the testimony shows, that immediately after the marriage ceremony the newly married couple came to New Orleans to live, and continuously thereafter resided there, as man and wife. In the course of the argument of defendants' counsel, they employ this language, viz.: "In Louisiana, however, while the general rule that the validity of a marriage is to be determined by the lex loci contractus is recognized, it has been held that, where parties go abroad to evade our local statutes prohibiting their marriage, the contract is null. Dupre v. Boulard, 10 La. Ann. 411; Babin v. Le Blanc, 13 La. Ann. 367; Maillefer v. Saillet, 4 La. Ann. 875; Saul v. His Creditors, 5 Mart. N. S. 569, 16 Am. Dec. 212; Caballero's Succession v. His Executor, 24 La. Ann. 573; Parsons, Cont. 6th ed. § 575, note on page 724 commenting on Saul v. His Creditors." We do not understand the law of Louisiana to limit the general doctrine that the lex loci shall govern marriages, as to the capacity of the parties, in any other way than by declaring that this rule shall not govern its citizens when they are incapacitated by a local prohibitory law from contracting marriage. That theory may be at once accepted, but it only goes to the extent that the marriage contracted abroad is intended to defeat the prohibition of a local statute. As this case stands now, with the prohibition of article 161 of the Code eliminated from the discussion, it is not the case of a marriage contracted abroad for the purpose of defeating the prohibition of a local statute. In the present attitude of the case, the converse of that proposition is exhibited; and it is whether a marriage in New York, of persons fully capacitated to contract marriage in Louisiana, where the marriage domicile is to be established, and where the husband has theretofore resided, will be declared a nullity by a Louisiana court because of a prohibition of a New York statute. "The law considers marriage in no other view than as a civil contract." Rev. Civ. Code, arts. 86, 90. And a general provision of our Code is that "the effect of acts passed in one country, to have effect in another country, is regulated by the laws of the country where such acts are to have effect." Id. art. 10. We have frequently applied the precept of this last article to interstate contracts, that were entered into in other states, to be executed in Louisiana; notably in Gates v. Gaither, 46 La. Ann. —. The principle is well settled that the matrimonial rights of the wife who marries with the intention of removing into another state must be governed by the laws of her intended domicile. Ford v. Ford, 2 Mart. N. S. 574, 14 Am. Dec. 201; Le Breton v. Nouchet, 8 Mart. 60, 5 Am. Dec. 736; Fisher v. Fisher, 2 La. Ann. 774. In Hayden v. Nutt, 4 La. Ann. 65, it was said that "it may be conceded that the defendant's counsel is correct in assuming that the marital rights of these parties must be regulated by the laws of their matrimonial domicile." In Routh v. Routh, 9 Rob. (La.) 224, 41 Am. Dec. 326, it was held that "where the parties contracted marriage with the bona fide intention of making Louisiana the place of their common or matrimonial domicile, and, in pursuance of such intention, did, within a reasonable time, become domiciled in this state, then the property belonging to the wife before the marriage . . . remains her separate estate." Connor v. Connor, 10 La. Ann. 440. In Arendell v. Arendell, Id. 566, the facts were that at the time of the marriage, in Alabama, the spouses intended to fix their matrimonial domicile in Mississippi, which they accordingly did; and the court held that the right of the husband to slaves owned by the wife at the time of the marriage must be determined by the laws of Mississippi, and not those of Alabama. In Ford v. Ford, 2 Mart. N. S. 574, 14 Am. Dec. 201, Judge Martin employed this expressive term, viz.: "The wife does not contract where she enters into matrimony but, where she, after the marriage, migrates or removes. Mulier non agit ubi matrimonium contraxit, sed ubi ex matrimonio migravit, vel discessit, agit." Cujas, ad l. 65, Exigere Dotem, 164." Or, in other words, "the place where marriage is contracted is not so much that where the ceremony is performed as that where the parties expect to live and settle;" the general rule being "to attend to the law of the husband's domicile, rather than that of the place in which the contract was entered into." Not only is this so with respect to the wife's rights of property subsequently acquired, but it is equally so with respect to the contract of marriage itself. The rule is stated by Judge Story thus: "The general principle certainly is, as we have already seen, that, between persons sui juris, marriage is to be decided by the law of the place where it is celebrated. If valid there, it is valid everywhere. It has a legal ubiquity of obligation." Story, Conf. L. § 113, citing Fergusson, Mar. & Div. But that author explains, in a marginal note, that "the principle is established that the validity of a marriage—the word 'marriage' being used in the sense of 'ceremony of marriage'—depends upon the law of the place where the ceremony is performed. When the question is whether it is lawful for the two persons to be united in wedlock, there is a difference of opinion as to the law by which the validity of the marriage (the word being used to designate the union in wedlock which the ceremony is intended to effect) is to be determined." Story, Conf. L. p. 188. But the question immediately under consideration—that is, the binding force of the contract of marriage in jurisdictions different from the one in which it was celebrated—is distinctly settled conformably to the jurisprudence of this court, the language of that author being as follows, viz.: "It is no answer to this reasoning to say that every nation has a right, at its pleasure, to impose any restraints and prohibitions upon the marriages of its own subjects, whether they marry within or without its own territory. Admitting this to be true in the fullest extent to which it can justly be claimed, in virtue of national sovereignty, it must be quite as true and quite as obvious that no other nation is bound to recognize those restraints and those prohibitions as obligatory upon such subjects while they are domiciled within its own territory, or when they have contracted marriage there according to the laws thereof." That author again says: "Personal disqualifications, not arising from the law of nature, but from the principles of the customary or positive law of a foreign country, and especially such as are of a penal nature, are not generally regarded in other countries, where the like disqualifications do not exist." Id. § 104. This doctrine was announced by the supreme court in The Antelope, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 66, 6 L. ed. 268, employing this emphatic declaration, viz.: "The courts of no country execute the penal laws of another." And the New York court of appeals said in Scoville v. Canfield, 14 Johns. 888, 7 Am. Dec. 467, viz.: "The penal acts of one state can have no operation in another state. They are strictly local and affect nothing more than they can reach." Story, Conf. L. § 621, p. 841. There can be no question of the fact that the New York statute under consideration is a penal law, and that the attempt of the defendants is to have it enforced against the plaintiff by the courts of this state. Mr. Wharton puts the proposition thus: "I cannot but think that both the history and policy of the law require that the rule should be stated as follows: . . . Consensual marriages abroad, by domiciled citizens of states holding such marriages to be valid, will not be invalidated because the forms prescribed in the state of celebration were not adopted," etc. Whart. Conf. L. § 170, p. 237. That author again says: "A marriage abroad, it is alleged, would be a nullity, if in fraud of the home law; but valid, if not in fraud of such law." Id. § 182, p. 264. That author quotes approvingly the following extract from Parsons on Contracts, viz.: "The rights of parties, as springing from the relation of marriage, must be determined by the place where they then supposed themselves, and intended to be, domiciled;" citing Le Breton v. Nouchet, 8 Mart. 60, 5 Am. Dec. 786; Ford v. Ford, supra; Allen v. Allen, 6 Rob. (La.) 104, 39 Am. Dec. 558; Whart. Conf. L. § 190, p. 272. Mr. Bishop puts the proposition quite tersely, 24 L. R. A.

thus: "Statutes take effect only in the country of their enactment. They do not so much as bind citizens abroad, except by express words. Therefore, a prohibition to the guilty party in divorce, to contract a second marriage, is without effect outside of the territorial limits of the prohibiting state. And this is so even under special statutory terms." That author then illustrates by citing a Kentucky case, as follows: "A Kentucky statute declared that the divorce for which it provided shall not operate so as to release the offending party, who shall nevertheless remain subject to all the pains and penalties which the law prescribes against a marriage while a former husband or wife is living." Thereupon, an offending woman, whose husband procured the dissolution decree, removed to Tennessee, and there married, and the Tennessee court held the marriage to be good." 2 Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 1618; Cor v. Combs, 8 B. Mon. 231; Roach v. Garrea, 1 Ves. Sr. 157.

In construing the statute of New York prohibiting second marriages of persons convicted of adultery, the court of appeals decided that the prohibition of the statute did not invalidate a second marriage entered into in Connecticut where it was valid; the act being in the nature of a penalty, and not, in express terms, showing the legislative intent to render such marriage, entered into in another state, void. Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N. Y. 18, 40 Am. Rep. 505. In Cropey v. Ogden, 11 N. Y. 228, the court gave an interpretation to the legislative act as it existed previous to the revision of the statutes of the state, with reference to the second marriage that was celebrated between citizens of that state, and by an officer of that state, and said: "The incapacity of an adulterer, divorced on that ground by our own courts, to marry again in this state during the life of the injured party, was grounded upon the views entertained by our legislature in respect to the marriage relation." Thorp v. Thorp, 90 N. Y. 602, 43 Am. Rep. 189, announces the same principle as that announced in Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, and affirms that decision. In Moore v. Hegeman, 92 N. Y. 521, 44 Am. Rep. 408, a similar question is stated and discussed,—the court stating that the main question which is presented upon this appeal is whether a marriage in New Jersey was legal and valid, or illegal, as in violation of the New York statute; and, answering that proposition, the court said: "The statute and decree prohibiting the marriage of the guilty party can have no effect beyond the territorial limits of this state. Where the laws of another state do not prohibit such a marriage by a party divorced, its validity cannot be questioned in this state." In our opinion, those decisions are strictly in keeping with our own jurisprudence, and the opinions of text-writers on the subject. They distinctly hold that the prohibition of the New York law has no extraterritorial effect, and that a citizen of that state is at liberty to go into another state, and contract a new marriage there, to which legal effect will be given by the courts of New York. That is no more than the plaintiff did. Residing in Paris, France, and Hernandez residing in the state of Louisiana, they availed themselves of the law of New York, and contracted marriage therein, intending to reside thereafter in Louisiana; and, actually residing there subsequently, it must be given the effect of a contract of marriage in Louisiana eo nomine, and, thus considered, it comes within the principle of the decisions of the New York court. A careful examination of authority has satisfied us that the plaintiff's contract of marriage, though celebrated in the city and state of New York, was legal and valid, and did not come within the prohibition of the New York statute. We see no reason to alter the decree of the court a qua.

An application for rehearing was subsequently filed in response to which on May 24, 1894, the following opinion was delivered:

We adhere to the principles of law announced in the opinion herein rendered, sustaining the marriage between the deceased, Joseph Hernandez, with Augusta L. Church, and recognizing Augusta L. Church to be the surviving widow in community of said Hernandez, and entitled to receive the legacies named in the last will of the deceased; but we are of opinion now that the rights and claims of such widow in community, as well as the demands of said Augusta L. Church for the payment of her legacies under the will, should be adjusted, liquidated, and finally settled, in the mortuaria of the deceased, contradictorily between the executors and heirs, in due and orderly course of the administration of the succession, and that such should have been the judgment and decision of the judge a quo. It is therefore ordered and decreed that so much of our opinion and decree as recognizes the legality of the marriage between Joseph Hernandez, deceased, and Augusta L. Church, and as decrees her entitled to receive the legacies specified in the last will of Joseph Hernandez, deceased, be, and the same are, maintained, but that in all other respects our former decree is set aside, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in the court a qua according to law and the views herein expressed. It is further ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be so amended and corrected as to conform to the judgment and decree herein pronounced; the costs of appeal to be taxed against the appellee; those of the lower court to await final judgment therein.

Rehearing refused.

Mayor and Common Council of the City of NEWARK, Plffs. in Err.,

v.

George WATSON et al.

(.....N. J.....)

1. The legislature in the exercise of its police power can lawfully prohibit the use of lands for the purposes of burial when such lands are held by a municipal corporation.
2. The plaintiffs, a municipal corporation, held lands under a grant from the proprietors of East New Jersey for burial purposes, to be appropriated for no other use or uses whatsoever. An ordinance of the municipality and an act of the legislature prohibited the use of such lands for burial purposes. Held, that the title to the lands thereby reverted to the proprietors.
3. Twenty years' adverse possession will establish a title against the proprietors. Quere, whether the first section of the Act of June 5, 1787 (Rev. p. 598), which provides that sixty years' possession, actual and uninterrupted, shall vest a complete title to lands, will defeat the title of a municipal corporation.

fendants in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The action was to recover a strip of land about 28 by 40 feet in the rear of property fronting on Broad street in the city of Newark. The city of Newark was settled by adventurers from the colony of New Haven, who came to New Jersey on invitation of the proprietors, from whom they expected to purchase land. They extinguished the Indian title. In 1669, a record was made of all the land laid out in the town. On this record certain spaces were left vacant, being laid out as commons, and they were dedicated as such by a town meeting on January 25, 1669. Under the concessions of the proprietors, the settlers were entitled to a certain amount of public lands, including 200 acres of land for church purposes. No patent for public land was given to the settlers for some time. A petition was finally presented by the inhabitants to the proprietors in 1696, which succeeded in securing the lands. The petitioners asked for "streets, market place", etc. The result was an order dated April 10, 1696, commanding the surveyor general to survey the parsonage land and other public places, and such survey was made. A patent was then issued for the land, granting it to four trustees, viz., John Curtis, John Treat, Theophilus Pierson and Robert Young, habendum to the grantees and their heirs "to the only proper use and benefit and behoof of the old settlers of the town of Newark, aforesaid, their heirs and assigns forever in common, granted to be and remain to and for the several uses herein particularly expressed and to be appropriated for no other use or uses whatsoever." The patent includes what is called the "parsonage lot," which was part of the tract originally set aside as commons and a part of another tract originally dedicated to public use, and by this time used for and known as the "burial place." The parsonage lot was considered part of the 200 acres granted for church purposes under the concession. The burial place is granted by the following description: "all that small tract allotted for a burying place, taking in the pond and meeting house, being 7 ch. in length and 4 ch. in breadth, bounded west by John Treat, south by John Johnson, north and east by highways."

The first and second meeting-houses of the town were erected on the front of this burying ground tract, and the remainder of the tract was used for burying purposes. Other public buildings were afterwards erected on the tract. At that time no church society was incorporated, and the meeting house was used in common and was as much a public matter as the court-house, jail, or schools. The First Presbyterian Church of Newark was incorporated June 7, 1753. The people of the town continued in possession of the burying ground and of the parsonage meadows as late as 1761. In 1760 the trustees of the first church procured from David Young, claimed to be the eldest son and heir of the surviving trustee, a deed that, it is insisted, included the parsonage land, and also the burying ground. This deed purported to be under authority of a town meeting, but the action in reference to the parsonage lands was disapproved at a meeting of the following year, and it was then declared to be the purpose of the inhabitants that the lands granted by the proprietors patent for the parsonage should be equally divided among the three churches then existing. The deed was not recorded until 1804, and it is not shown whether or not the inhabitants knew that it purported to include the burying ground. This burying ground tract included the land in controversy in this action. That tract was used for public burials until 1830. Prior to 1784, a portion of it, which was swampy and considered unfit for burial purposes, was taken possession of by the church and filled up. This portion also included the locus in quo. In 1784 that portion of the burying ground was leased by the church to Jesse Baldwin for the term of twenty-one years. Other lands in the vicinity were leased by the church to various lessees between that time and 1794. At this time the public authorities were in possession of that portion of the burial ground which contained the jail and jail garden. In 1890 the church corporation sold the church building to the chosen freeholders of Essex County, and the building was subsequently used as a court-house. In 1810 the land on which it stood, together with that on which the jail and jail garden was located, was conveyed by the chosen freeholders to trustees to sell and with the proceeds erect a court-house. Various acts of the legislature were passed after that time which affected the tract in some ways not material to this controversy, under the sanction of one of which the first church conveyed to other churches certain portions of the land, and by this conveyance the locus in quo was conveyed to the second presbyterian church, 24 L. R. A.

under which the defendant Watson now holds as tenant. Subsequently Van Buren Ryerson conceiving that as the old burying ground was granted by the proprietors upon the condition that it should only be used as a burying ground, and the condition having been broken that the land had reverted to the proprietors, bought the proprietary right for ten acres from Archer Gifford and caused a survey to be made in 1844 of the burying ground and other public lands in Newark. The board of proprietors refused to pass the survey. In December, 1844, an information was filed in chancery by him and others in the name of the attorney-general, setting out the encroachment on the public burying ground and the fact that the city had leased it, and praying that the city be enjoined from making that use of the land and that it be devoted to public use. Soon after the Act of March 3, 1848, was passed which purports to quiet the possession of so much of the old burying ground as was then occupied, and directs the mayor and council of Newark to protect and keep in repair the burying ground and its enclosures, with the proviso that the Act shall not affect any vested rights. Thereupon the Ryerson suit appears to have been dropped. On September 16, 1862, Ryerson's right in the burying ground was sold at sheriff's sale and bought in by one Halecy, who subsequently gave a deed of extinguishment to the city of Newark and the various churches and other persons having claim to the lands included in Ryerson's survey. The deed provides that the grantee shall hold the lands independently of the Ryerson title in the same manner as if the claim or title of Ryerson did not exist. In 1896 the city was authorized to devote to other public uses the land held for burial purposes and in 1887 the common council passed a resolution that the bodies should be removed and the ground appropriated for a country market. This action was then brought to obtain possession of that portion of the ground in possession of defendant Watson as tenant of the church.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Joseph Coult, Howard W. Hayes, and Cortlandt Parker, for plaintiff in error:

The title to the locus in quo vested in the city, under the patent of December 10, 1696, by the operation of the statute of uses.

The town of Newark was incorporated at the time the patent of December 10, 1696, was given, and the capacity to receive a grant of land.

Incorporation may be proved by evidence of the existence of a charter that has been lost; by the presumption arising from long continued use of corporate powers; or from the legislature recognizing the community as a corporate body.

If the town was so incorporated, it was capable of receiving that grant.

Dill. Mun. Corp. § 562.

A grant from the crown to a body of men incorporates them to the extent necessary for the enjoyment of the grant.

A patent from a colonial governor has the same effect.

Even if Newark was not incorporated at the date of the patent, the fee under the patent would remain in abeyance and vest in the town at the time of its incorporation in 1718.

It was contended at the trial that the statute of uses did not apply to a conveyance of this kind, that the municipality would be a trustee for the public, and that the effect of vesting the use in it would be only to transfer the fee from one trustee to another.

The answer to that contention is, that the first grantees are not declared by the deed to be trustees for the public.

The municipality is not a trustee for the inhabitants. It is the representative of the inhabitants, the legal entity, of which the inhabitants are the component part. In the eye of the law it is the inhabitants.

Whenever it is possible, a conveyance will always be deemed to take effect at common law and not under the statute.

If the English statute of uses was not in force in the colony, at the time of this patent, or present statute of uses, which was enacted in 1714, would vest the estate in the cestui que use, as it applies to uses theretofore created and then existing.

If the legal title to the locus in quo did not vest in the town under the statute of uses, a surrender of the legal title by the trustees to the town will be presumed to have been made in 1718 at the time of its incorporation under the charter from Queen Anne.

Even if the legal title is not in the city, it has such a beneficial use in, and right to possession of, the locus in quo that ejectment will lie.

Hempstead*, 2 Wend. 109.

The deed from David Young to the trustees of the First Presbyterian Church, made March 18, 1760, did not attempt to convey the locus in quo.

The Act of 1804 did not affect the legal title to the premises in question.

This proviso does not have the effect of vesting the title of the land excepted by it.

Wayman v. Southard, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 253; Minis v. United States, 40 U. S. 15 Pet. 423, 10 L. ed. 791; Portland Sav. Inst. v. Makin, 23 Me. 360; Detroit v. Detroit & E. Pl. Road Co., 12 Mich. 333; Pearce v. Bank of Mobile, 33 Ala. 693.

The Acts of 1825 and 1843 do not attempt to vest the title to this land in the church not to extinguish the city's right of possession.

If the first church did not have the title to the land under the act, no title would pass by their conveyance, notwithstanding the recital in the preamble that the title to the parsonage and part of the burying place is vested in the first church. The preamble does not attempt to vest the title. It is not part of the enacting clause and has no enacting force.

Even if the legal title is not in the plaintiff the beneficial use in, and right to the possession of, the premises is a property right, and could not be taken away or extinguished by the legislature without the consent of the municipality. Such action of the legislature would be invalid, as (a) taking private property without compensation, and for private purposes; (b) impairing the obligations of the contract contained in the patent of December 10, 1696.

Mr. Frederic W. Stevens, for defendant in error:

The defendant's legal title is as follows:

The proprietors, by their patent of December 10, 1696, granted the "burying place" and certain other lands to four trustees and their heirs, to the use of the old settlers of the town of Newark, their heirs and assigns forever. David Young, eldest son and heir-at-law of Robert Young, the survivor of those trustees, on March 30, 1760, granted the burying place and the parsonage land to the trustees of the First Presbyterian Church in Newark, to hold on the same trust that he held. In 1804, the legislature enacted that the estate vested in the original trustees by the patent of December 10, 1696, should thereafter be vested in the inhabitants of the township of Newark, with a proviso to the effect that nothing therein contained should extend to the parsonage lands or "to such parts of the burying ground . . . as have either been leased or sold by the trustees of the First Presbyterian Church in Newark" previous to January 1, 1804.

Up to 1825 the land so leased continued subject to the use impressed upon it by the patent of 1696; but in that year the legislature authorized its conveyance to the defendant and to three other churches for a different use, viz.: "solely and forever for the support of the gospel in the said congregations . . . and for no other use or purpose." A conveyance to this use was actually made to defendant in 1827. In 1848 the legislature again interposed and declared that the occupation of such parts of the ground as were then occupied for purposes other than as a burying ground should remain undisturbed.

The use at the time it was created in 1696 was treated as a religious use, and was so regarded by the successors to the parties for more than one hundred years thereafter. If this be so, then there is not the slightest foundation for the assumption by the city that it exclusively, and not the church, was the proper conservator of it.

The governor and council, the agent and representatives of the proprietors, were not authorized by those grants and concessions to give land for a "burying place," if such gift differed in anything but name from a gift of land for a church, with its then invariable concomitant or appurtenance, a churchyard. When the grant was made the church and churchyard were there, and the grant was intended not to alter, but to confirm, the existing order of things and establish it upon legal foundations.

Gilbert v. Buzzard, 3 Phillm. 348; 2 Co. Inst. 487; Burn, Eccl. Law, title Burial, 253.

"At the original endowment of parish churches, the freehold of the church, the churchyard, the parsonage house, the glebe, and the tithes of the parish were vested in the parson."

1 Bl. Com. 470.

How completely the idea that the churchyard was as sacred as the church, had taken hold of the minds of men appears from its use as a sanctuary by those who fled thither from the pursuit of justice.

Burn, Eccl. Law, title Church, ed. 1843, 894.

In Pew v. Cresswell, 2 Strange, 1013, it is said, "for though interrupting the use of a churchyard, as a church-yard, is properly cognizable in the ecclesiastical court, yet the bounds of it, which is matter of freehold, ought not to be determined there.

The old statutes speak the same language.

Stat. 13 Edw. I., chap. 6; Stat. 50 Edw. III.; Stats. 5 & 6 Edw. VI.; Burn, Justice, title Church and Church-yard 1, p. 864.

Such was the law of England, at the time of the settlement of Newark. The parish church-yard was the only Christian burial place.

The question of whether land is affected by a pious use does not depend upon the peculiar views of the particular congregation, but rather upon the nature of the use.

And if by the common and the statute law of England, as it existed when the province of New Jersey was settled, the church yard—in which stood the parish church—was deemed to have been devoted to a pious use, then the burial place, in the midst of which stood "the meeting house," must also be deemed to have been devoted to a similar use.

The grantees named in the patent of 1696 were a colorless body; they held some of the lands granted to pious uses, and some to municipal uses. Whether the use in the case of any given piece of land was parochial or municipal must therefore have been determined with reference to its inherent character.

Tyler, Am. Eccl. Law, § 969; Re Brick, Presby. Church, 8 Edw. Ch. 169, 6 L. ed. 613; Richards v. Northwest Prot. Dutch Church, 32 Barb. 42.

The trustees were interposed for the purpose of supporting the charitable use, which would otherwise have failed altogether, for want of a definite and competent person to take.

The land was, by the terms of the patent, "to be holder in free and common socage of us the proprietors, our heirs and assigns forever, as of the seignorie of East Greenwich, yielding and paying therefor unto us the proprietors . . . sixpence sterling monie of England, on every five and twentieth day of March, forever hereafter, in lieu and stead of all other services." Here was an active duty to be performed by tenants in socage, selected by the lords proprietors to do them service. This of itself would constitute the trust an active one, and would prevent the statute from operating, even if there were no other reason why it should not.

Paulmier v. Howland, 49 N. J. Eq. 367; Melick v. Pidcock, 44 N. J. Eq. 543.

It must have been at least a matter of doubt, whether a corporation, had there been one constituted, could have held, under the mortmain acts, except by special license, from the crown.

1 Greenleaf's Cruise, Digest, Real Prop. 53. If the use was, in 1696, deemed to be a religious use, and was so considered up to the year 1825, the church, having the legal title, was itself chargeable with the conservation of the public interests. The city has no superior right as against it. If the church commits a breach of trust, it can only be called to account for it in a court of equity.

Chambersburg v. Manko, 39 N. J. L. 496.

The legislature has an undoubted right to substitute for a charitable use that has become incapable of execution, another charitable use.

Van Syckel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The writ of error in this case brings up for review the judgment of the supreme court in an action of ejectment brought by the mayor and common council of the city of Newark against George Watson, as tenant, and the trustees of the Second Presbyterian Church of Newark, as landlords, to recover the possession of a small parcel of land in the city of Newark, which is part of a lot situate at the south-easterly corner of Broad and Market streets, in said city, and was originally designated as the "Old Burying Ground." This, with other lands, was conveyed by the proprietors of the province of East New Jersey, by deed dated December 10, 1696, to John Curtis, John Treat, Theophilus Pierson, and Robert Young to have and to hold to them, their heirs and assigns forever, to the only proper use, benefit, and behoof of the "old settlers of the town of Newark, for a burying ground, and to be appropriated for no other use or purpose whatsoever." On the 7th of June, 1753, George the Second granted a charter to the First Presbyterian Church, by which the society was incorporated under the name of the "Trustees of the First Presbyterian Church in Newark," with power to hold and convey lands. The town records of the town of Newark, under date of March 12, 1760, shows the following resolution: "Whereas, David Young, of Hanover, Morris county, is thought by some to be heir-at-law of our parsonage patents, as he is the heir of Robert Young, the oldest patentee, it is thought by some proper that this vote be put whether the trustees of the First Presbyterian Church at Newark shall apply to said David Young for a deed of conveyance to them in trust, that the said trustees may be the better enabled to be guardians for the same for said church." This vote was accordingly put, and the resolution unanimously passed. Prior to this time, a meeting house had been erected upon a part of the lands conveyed by the proprietors' deed, and Robert Young, who had survived the other trustees named in said deed, was also deceased, leaving the said David Young his oldest son and heir-at-law, surviving him. In pursuance of said resolution, David Young, on the 18th of March, 1760, executed a deed for a certain portion of said lands to the trustees of the First Presbyterian Church of Newark. The trustees of the First Presbyterian Church of Newark, by deed dated March 24, 1827, conveyed the same premises to the defendant the trustees of the Second Presbyterian Church of Newark. The plaintiffs deny that these deeds embrace the locus in quo. In my judgment, this contention is not well founded. The deed of March 18, 1760, describes lot 7 as "that small tract, allotted for the burying place, taking in the pond and meeting house." From this statement it appears that the meeting house was erected on the burying place, and that it was intended that the said conveyance should include the locus in quo. It is also clear that such was the understanding of the framer of the Act of 1825. This, however, is not material in the view which will be taken of this case. There is no doubt that the grantees in these deeds, as well as the inhabitants of the town, assumed that the title to the locus in quo passed by the deeds, as it is incontestably shown that from April 22, 1784, the premises in question have been occupied by tenants under leases from the First Church up to March 24, 1827, and since that date by tenants under leases from the Second Church.

On the 15th of February, 1804, the legislature passed an act entitled "An act to vest in the inhabitants of the township of Newark, in the county of Essex, a certain estate now in the hands of trustees." The first section of this act provided that the trust estate vested in the trustees named in the proprietors' deed of the 10th of December, 1696, should henceforth cease, and be void. The second section provided that the estate vested by said deed in the said trustees should be vested in the inhabitants of the township of Newark, as incorporated by law, and their successors, forever; and that they should be vested with the legal title as fully and absolutely as though they had been originally named in said deed in the place of said trustees; "provided also that nothing herein contained shall in any way extend to or affect the parsonage lands contained and particularly described and expressed in said grant; and also such parts of the burying ground mentioned and described in said grant as have either been leased or sold by the trustees of the First Presbyterian Church in Newark previous to the first day of January last; and also the ground on which the market in said town of Newark now standeth." The lot of which the locus in quo is part was leased by the trustees of the First Presbyterian Church to David Baldwin, April 22, 1784. By an act of the legislature passed November 4, 1825, the trustees of the first Presbyterian Church were authorized to convey said lands in fee to the trustees of the Second Presbyterian Church, and under and by virtue of that act the deed of March 24, 1827, was made to the latter church. At a town meeting held April 18, 1829, it was resolved that no more interments should be made in the old burying ground. On the 8d of March, 1848, the legislature passed an act which is of controlling importance in this case, the title of which is "An act requiring the mayor and common council of the city of Newark to protect and keep in repair the old burying ground in said city, and quieting the possession of such parts of said burying ground as are already occupied." The preamble recites as follows: "Whereas the old burying ground of the city of Newark hath for years ceased to be used as a place for burying the dead; and whereas it has so occurred by lapse of time, that a portion of the land originally allotted for the purpose of a burying ground, lying adjacent to the premises now designated by enclosures as the old burying ground, has been appropriated for other purposes, and has been improved for the most part by erecting thereon expensive buildings; and whereas it hath been insisted that the portion of said ground appropriated and occupied otherwise than for a burying ground should be restored to the use for which it was originally set apart, and according to the trust to which it is alleged the same is subject, which would be attended with great inconvenience, and subject innocent purchasers to great pecuniary loss, and be of no public utility, inasmuch as the location of said ground renders it improper and inexpedient to make any further interment therein; and whereas it is desirable that the said burying ground, enclosed as aforesaid, should be protected, and that the occupancy of the portion occupied otherwise than for a burying ground should be quieted: Therefore, be it enacted by the senate and general assembly of New Jersey, that it shall be the duty of the mayor and common council of the city of Newark to protect and preserve the burying ground, as now enclosed as aforesaid, and the enclosures thereof; and that the occupation of such parts of said ground, originally allotted as aforesaid, as are now occupied for purposes other than as a burying ground as aforesaid, shall remain undisturbed, and that the mayor and common council of the city of Newark shall apply such proceeds and profits thereof as they may receive to the protecting and keeping in repair the burying ground aforesaid, and the enclosures thereof: provided nevertheless, that nothing in this act contained shall in any manner affect the vested rights, if any, of any person or persons in the said lands, independent of the said alleged trusts: and provided, that this act shall not confer any additional rights to any person or persons, as to the lands south of the town lot bordering on the said burying ground and which have within the last ten years been enclosed." Thus it appears that by the resolution of the town meeting in July, 1829, the cestuis que trustent refused to use the locus in quo for the only use to which it was held for them under the proprietors' deed, and the Act of the Legislature of 1848 provided that it should no longer be used for such purposes. The last mentioned act, after reciting that portions of the burying ground had been appropriated to other purposes, and improved for the most part by building thereon, and that it would be improper to make further interments therein, expressly enacts that such parts of said ground as are so occupied for other purposes shall remain undisturbed. The effect of this recital and provision was to constrain the city to abandon the only use for which it held this land. The Act of 1804 declares that the trust estate vested in the trustees by the deed of 1696 shall cease, and that the legal estate, as well as the beneficial use, shall be vested in the inhabitants of the township of Essex. This act does not purport to enlarge the uses, or to divert these lands from the uses, to which they were devoted by the deed of the proprietors; and I have found no limitation upon the power of the lawmaker to dispense with the necessity of a trustee in dealing with the rights of a public corporation. The effect of the proviso was to circumscribe the operation of the Act of 1804, so that it vested in the township the legal title to such lands only as were not within the proviso. Under the rule for the construction of statutes, the proviso operated neither to convey lands within its terms, nor to discharge such lands from the trusts originally imposed. It was potent, however, to withdraw the premises mentioned in it from the effect of the body of the act, thereby excluding such lands from the legal estate granted by the act, and leaving the legal estate in them where it previously was, and subject to the public trusts which had been declared in the grant. But the Act of 1825 has a far wider range. It purports to authorize and validate a conveyance in fee by a municipal corporation to a religious body of lands, conveyed in trust to be used by such municipality for the sole purpose of a burying ground, not only thereby discharging the sole public use, but devoting the lands, in contravention of the owner's grant, to a wholly different and private charitable use. Whether any stable foundation can be found in the law for such legislation is very doubtful. The importance of the Acts of 1825 and 1848 is that the lands in controversy were thereby discharged from the trusts they were originally subject to. No title vested in the municipality under the original patent of 1696. That title first became vested in it by the Act of 1804. Newark v. Stockton, 44 N. J. Eq. 179. That act having excluded from its operation the lands now in question, the right of the township as to them was a right of possession merely, as incident and essential to the duty assumed for the protection and preservation of the dedicated premises, for the purpose of enabling the public to avail itself of the declared uses.

The questions, therefore, to be solved, are whether the legislature had the power, with the concurrence of the beneficial owners of the land, to abolish and prohibit the sole use for which such owners held it, and, if so, what consequences flow from the exercise of that power. The power of the legislature to restrain or prohibit the use even of private property in a way detrimental to the public health or safety is beyond dispute. The case of Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, shows how comprehensive and broad this power is. In that case the federal court declared that it was the province of the legislature primarily to determine whether the public health or morals required the exercise of this power, although it must be settled ultimately by the courts whether, in any given case, the legislature has exceeded its prerogative. All rights are held subject to the power of the state over the public health and morals. Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. ed. 989; Butchers Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 111 U. S. 748, 28 L. ed. 585; New Orleans Gas-Light Co. v. Louisiana Light & H. P. & Mfg. Co. 115 U. S. 650, 29 L. ed. 516. It being competent for the legislature not only to change and modify political districts, but also to dissolve them at pleasure, its power to control and extinguish the uses to which property may be held by such political districts must be wider than that which pertains to the property of private persons. Mr. Justice Depue, in delivering the opinion of this court in Hoboken Land & Imp. Co. v. Hoboken, 85 N. J. L. 549, said that the legislature alone has the power to release the dedicated lands and discharge the public servitude when once it has attached. The rights of the legislature to forbid a municipal corporation to appropriate its lands within corporate limits to burial purposes is incontrovertible. Such enactments are not unconstitutional, either as impairing the obligation of contracts, or taking private property for public use without compensation. They are unassailable as an exercise of the police power. Coates v. New York, 7 Cow. 585; Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, 122. Whether there is any limitation upon this rule as applicable to private cemetery companies may present a different question. Where the absolute fee in lands is acquired by a municipal corporation, although with an expressed intention of using it for a special purpose, the property acquired may be applied by legislative authority to a wholly different public object; but, where the grant to the corporation is only for a specified use, the grantor retains the reversionary estate. Heard v. Brooklyn, 60 N. Y. 242. This is a familiar rule as applicable to lands dedicated for public highways, or taken under the power of eminent domain. In Kent County Supra. v. Grand Rapids, 61 Mich. 144, lands were donated to a county for county seat purposes, and the county seat was afterwards removed elsewhere. In an action of ejectment to recover possession of the lands, it was held that the county had no interest in them. In Young v. Mahoning County Commrs., 51 Fed. Rep. 585, the lands were donated by the owner of the fee to a municipal body for a burying ground, and that body afterwards passed an ordinance prohibiting the further use of it for such purposes. The ordinance was declared to be a valid exercise of the police power, and also to operate as a complete abandonment of the dedicated use, by which the lands reverted to the original owner. This rule will not apply where the use can be enforced by an application to equity to compel a specific execution of the trust. The case before us is not within this exception. There is no power in a court of equity to compel an appropriation of the locus in quo to be made to burial purposes in contravention of the resolution of April 18, 1829, and the Act of 1848, before recited. There has been an actual and complete abandonment and prohibition of the use, and an inability on the part of equity to intervene, for more than forty years. By the absolute extinction of the sole use for which the plaintiffs held this land, the fee reverted to the original proprietors of East New Jersey; and, the title being thereby, after 1848, in the proprietors, and not in the plaintiffs, the statute of limitations began to run in favor of the defendants in ejectment in 1848. The sole use for which the trustees held the title under the proprietor's deed has long since been extinguished; and there has been no existing public right in the locus in quo since the passage of the Act of 1848, which impeded the running of the statute of limitations as against the proprietors, or as against the trustees and their heirs, if they continued to hold the bare legal title, discharged of the public use. If we assume that the title did not revert to the proprietors, but that the legal title remained in the trustees, stripped of the trust, the result is not changed. The object of the proprietors' conveyance had wholly failed. The trust was barren, and its execution prohibited. There remained in the public no interest in the land to which the rule nullum tempus could apply. There was no public right to be saved, and nothing to hinder the running of the statute of limitations against the holders of the legal title.

My conclusion is that the defendants have acquired title by adverse possession under the seventeenth section of the Act for the limitation of actions, which provides that every action for lands shall be brought within twenty years after the right or title accrued. It also appears in the case that aside from the operation of the statute of limitations, the defendants have acquired the proprietors' title to the locus in quo. On the 9th of September, 1857, the proprietors granted to Van Buren Ryerson their title to the burying place. This title was sold in September, 1862, to Joseph A. Halsey, by the sheriff of Essex county, under a judgment and execution against Ryerson. Halsey, on the 1st day of July, 1865, conveyed to the trustees of the Second Presbyterian Church in Newark, the defendant in ejectment. This renders it unnecessary to discuss the important question whether the first section of the Act of June 5, 1787 (Rev. p. 598), which provides that sixty years' possession, actual and uninterrupted, shall vest a complete title to lands, will run against a municipal corporation.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Sarah M. MYGATT et al., Appts.,
v.

George S. COE, Resp't.

(142 N. Y. 73.)

1. An estate to which the husband's covenant of warranty can attach is transferred where he joins with his wife in a deed of land, of which neither has a valid title in fact, although she has color of title, of which he is in possession while his wife occupies the premises with him, and on their joint conveyance he delivered the possession to the grantee and shared in the purchase money,—especially where his covenant is not only with the grantee, but with her "heirs and assigns."

2. Purchasers at a foreclosure sale are in privity with the mortgagor's grantor so as to be able to maintain an action against him for breach of the covenants in his deed.

(April 10, 1894.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the New York Circuit in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce the alleged liability of defendant upon covenants in a certain deed. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Edward M. Grout, for appellants:

If the defendant be liable at all, the plaintiffs are entitled to enforce that liability.

Christ Prot. Episcopal Church v. Mack, 93 N. Y. 488; Mygatt v. Coe, 11 L. R. A. 646, 124 N. Y. 212.

The facts now shown of the defendant's possession, his conveying, his receiving the purchase price, his delivering possession, and his covenants of warranty and quiet enjoyment to the heirs and assigns of the grantee, create a privity between the parties upon which the plaintiffs can recover.

The intention of the defendant in making the covenants is of the first importance. He did not do it as an idle form. His agreement, for a consideration whose receipt he acknowledges, was to warrant, not only his grantee, but her heirs and assigns, in the possession of the premises. Can the court now say that this meant only the grantee, and that the words "heirs and assigns" are merely surplusage?

Dexter v. Beard, 180 N. Y. 549; Clark v. Deos, 124 N. Y. 120; Beddos v. Wadsworth, 21 Wend. 120.

That the defendant was in possession, assumed to convey title, and delivered the possession, is sufficient to make his covenants run with the land, and inure to the benefit of these plaintiffs.

Slater v. Rawson, 1 Met. 450; Mygatt v. Coe, 11 L. R. A. 646, 124 N. Y. 221; Rawle, Covenants for Title, 5th ed. § 233; Wilson v. Widenham, 51 Me. 566; Dickson v. Denire, 23 Mo. 151; Fields v. Squires, 1 Deady, 389; Wead v. Larkin, 54 Ill. 489, 5 Am. Rep. 149.

"Privity" is merely successive relationships to the same rights of property.

19 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 156.

Mr. William J. Gaynor, with Messrs. Charles P. Buckley and William W. Buckley, also for appellants:

Being in possession, Coe joined with his wife in the actual conveyance of the land to Mrs. Fisher.

He joined in the conveyance as an actual grantor. His act must be given its full significance. If he was a stranger to the true title, so was his wife, and that fact could help neither of them. He had as much title as she had, and he was in possession, and delivered possession.

That the covenant of seisin is that the wife was seised does not detract from the force of his covenants of warranty and quiet enjoyment.

Thompson v. Simpson, 128 N. Y. 270.

Wherever an obligation is undertaken by two or more, or a right given to two or more, it is the general presumption of law that it is a joint obligation or right. Words of express joinder are not necessary for this purpose; but on the other hand, there should be words of severance, in order to produce a several responsibility or a several right.

The word "assigns" so used always means devisees or grantees. The words "heirs and assigns" as meaning heirs, devisees, and grantees, are of ancient use. They have been so used in conveyancing from the beginning.

8 Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. § 2, subsec. 2, p. 6.

These covenants ran with the land because they were in terms between the parties and their respective heirs and assigns, were connected with the subject of the grant, and entered into the value thereof.

Nye v. Hoyle, 120 N. Y. 195; Clement v. Burts, 121 N. Y. 708.

The words "heirs and assigns" used in the making of such covenants are prospective.

They are intended to connect the covenantor by contract not merely with his immediate grantee, but with all of his successors in title; to put the covenantor by contract in privity with every successive grantee, and to allow the last grantee to directly sue the first covenantor in the chain for a breach of the covenants.

Coleman v. Braham, 54 Hun. 619; Andrus v. Appel, 22 Hun. 429; Ernst v. Parsons, 54 How. Pr. 163; Boyd v. Belmont, 58 How. Pr. 514; Colby v. Osgood, 29 Barb. 389; Preiss v. Le Poiderin, 19 Abb. N. C. 123.

They mean that each covenant "should be construed as perpetual, and as a covenant running with the land."

Hart v. Lyon, 90 N. Y. 668; Peters v. Bowman, 98 U. S. 56, 25 L. ed. 91.

If the former record had shown that the covenants in express words put the last grantee in privity with the first covenantor, can one suppose that the court would have said there was no such privity? that such grantee could not sue on the covenants, but that they were owned by Mrs. Fisher, her executors or personal assigns?

Such privity is sufficient, however created.

Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268; Gifford v. Corrigan, 6 L. R. A. 610, 117 N. Y. 257; Van Schnick v. Third Ave. R. Co. 38 N. Y. 346; Barlow v. Myers, 64 N. Y. 41, 21 Am. Rep. 582; Hand v. Kennedy, 63 N. Y. 149.

If they did not so go down the chain, then after Mrs. Fisher made her conveyance, the defendant could have acquired the true title from the Howell heirs, and in the face of his said covenants with her, and her heirs and assigns, of the land, ejected the last grantee.

If one who so covenants have not the title when he covenants but afterwards acquires it, it inures to the last grantee in the chain of title under him.

Thompson v. Simpson, 128 N. Y. 270; House v. McCormick, 57 N. Y. 310; Tefft v. Munson, 63 Barb. 31; White v. Patten, 24 Pick. 324; Trull v. Eastman, 3 Met. 121, 37 Am. Dec. 126.

The sense in which we say that the covenants of warranty and quiet enjoyment in conveyances of real property become attached to and run with the land is that they attach to and run with the title which the grantor assumes to convey, by sticking to the land as possession of it is successively delivered though in fact the grantor is a stranger to the true title.

Norman v. Wells, 17 Wend. 136; Bally v. Wells, 3 Wils. 25.

The cases laying down the common-law rule that as a covenant of seisin is broken, if ever, on the delivery of the deed, it therefore does not pass by subsequent conveyances, help to illustrate the rule.

Greenby v. Wilcocks, 2 Johns. 1, 3 Am. Dec. 379; Hamilton v. Wilson, 4 Johns. 72, 4 Am. Dec. 253; Abbott v. Allen, 14 Johns. 248.

That such covenants after breach did not go down the chain, however, never was the common-law rule in England, and it is not the prevailing rule in this country.

Warvelle, Vendors, p. 939, and note; Devlin, Deeds, § 940.

If the covenant be co-extensive with the estate demised, and respect the thing, and be made with the party and his assigns, it passes with the land.

Mr. William S. Cogswell, with Mr. Lyman B. Bunnell, for respondent:

The subject-matter of this action is res judicata.

Mygatt v. Coe, 11 L. R. A. 646, 124 N. Y. 212.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is our duty to follow and abide by the decision of the second division of this court made in the case at bar when it was before them on appeal, so far as the facts found, and the questions determined, are identical. Williamsburgh Sav. Bank v. Solon, 136 N. Y. 465; Cluff v. Day, 141 N. Y. 690. Reserving freedom of thought and action when the case becomes a precedent, only, we must here and now, in the same action between the same parties, accept without criticism what has been decided. It is claimed, however, the

upon the last trial new evidence and new findings have totally changed the situation, and introduced questions not previously considered or decided, and that the plaintiffs may now succeed without in the least impugning or contradicting the prior determination. It is to such inquiry that our attention should be principally directed, and it may usefully be preceded by an examination of the points which must be deemed to have been involved in the prior decision.

Our brethren of the second division disagreed among themselves (Mygatt v. Coe, 124 N. Y. 212, 11 L. R. A. 646), as was not strange, in view of the fact that the question brought to their judgment a judicial quarrel almost as venerable as the common law itself, and open yet to vigorous dispute, Rawle, Covenants, [5th ed.] § 208, note 2. The majority of the court held that privity of estate is essential to carry covenants of warranty to subsequent grantees so as to support a right of action by them against the original covenantor whenever evicted by a title paramount to his; that a covenant of warranty made by one having neither title nor possession, and so no estate in the land, will not run with it into the hands of subsequent grantees, but will stop where the privity of contract ends, and so at the first or original covenantee; and that the covenant of Coe, the husband, upon which this action is founded, was that of a stranger to the title,—an independent and collateral warrantor,—having and transferring no estate in the land, and so in no sense or degree a privy in estate with the subsequent grantees. The point of the decision is emphasized, and made clear, by the dissent of the minority. They advocated the doctrine that privity of estate is not always essential to carry the covenant down the line of successive grantees, and that one who conveyed nothing, but covenanted much, like the prior of the covenant who promised perpetual song to the manor chapel, might find his covenant attached to the land, and running with it into the hands, and for the benefit, of successive owners. But, while holding and defending this doctrine Judge Bradley, who wrote the dissenting opinion, did not press the point, or rely upon it as the ground of ultimate decision, but insisted that Coe, the covenantor, was not a stranger to the title, because he joined with his wife as a grantor, and assumed to unite with her in transferring to Mrs. Fisher the estate which actually passed. The precise point of disagreement was thus over the attitude and position of the husband in making the conveyance; and the decisive question became whether he did or did not transfer an estate,—some estate,—to which his covenant could attach, and run with it down the line of transfer. The facts which dictated the conclusion of the majority are carefully stated in the opinion of Judge Follett who expressed their views. He adverted to the circumstances that the deed from Coe and his wife was not spread upon the record, and might contain something not fully or accurately described in the findings. These, however, showed that the land was conveyed to Mrs. Coe by a deed from an assumed owner, running to her severally, and in her own individual right, and that while her husband did join with her in the conveyance to Mrs. Fisher, their covenant of seisin was, not that he was seised or that they were seised, but that she was seised of a full estate in the land. While the joint grant indicated title in the two, and some estate in each, as the minority claimed, the form of the joint covenant asserted seisin in the wife alone, which the majority took for the truth. To such last inference the prevailing opinion awarded a predominant force, for several expressed reasons. One was that the proof and the findings failed to show any possession in Coe, beyond a mere occupancy by the sufferance of his wife, or any transfer of possession by him to Mrs. Fisher. The words of the opinion are these: "The defendant having no estate, title, or interest in, or possession of, the land conveyed, there could be no privity of estate between him and Nancy Fisher." A second reason was that it did not appear that Coe received any part of the consideration paid by the grantee. The language of the opinion in this respect, is: "And it was conceded on the argument in this court that it does not appear whether the defendant received the whole or any part of the consideration of the deed." It is thus obvious that the inference of neither title nor possession in Coe, the husband, drawn from the form of the covenant of seisin, was allowed to prevail because no other fact in the record necessarily contradicted it.

But now three such facts make their appearance in the findings, and force from us a different inference. Referring to the deed from Coe and his wife to Mrs. Fisher, the tenth finding of fact is as follows: "That, when the said conveyance was so made and delivered, the defendant was in possession of the said real property, consisting of a plot of land with a dwelling house thereon, being there domiciled and residing with his family." And the eleventh finding is: "That, upon the execution and delivery of the said conveyance, the defendant moved out of the said premises, and surrendered the same to the said grantee, who thereupon went into possession of the same." We do not and cannot know upon what proof or upon what facts these findings were based, for none of the evidence given is contained in the record. We are obliged to assume that sufficient and competent proof produced them, and that they are, in all respects, strictly true. Nor can we narrow or modify them by recurring to the form of the covenant and of the deed running to Mrs. Coe alone. At best, these only raised certain presumptions, but presumptions existing from the absence of any contrary facts. Coe's covenant that his wife was seised justified the presumption that he had no possession, and the maxim that "possession follows the deed" is expressive only of the presumption which the law raises when there is no proof of the actual facts. Pratt v. Ireland, 66 Barb. 389. But these presumptions give way before the proven truth. They fall when the facts themselves are shown, and we cannot indulge a presumption that Coe was not in possession, in the face of a finding that he was, or that he did not transfer the possession to Mrs. Fisher, when the explicit finding is that he did. I tried for a time, in my reflections, to think that the learned trial judge may have used the word "possession" in the improper but harmless sense of occupation, but swiftly saw that I had no warrant to change his words, and that there could be no doubt that he used them carefully, and in their full legal significance, for the circumstances strongly point to that as the truth. The case had been before the second division. Both opinions pointed out the vital importance of the inquiry whether Coe had possession, or transferred it to Mrs. Fisher; and the action was retried, and the present findings made, in the full light of those opinions. It is not conceivable, under such circumstances, that the learned trial judge carelessly or inaccurately found as a fact that Coe was in possession, or failed to appreciate the full force of the finding; and that is made more obvious by the fact that in the second finding the wife is said to have entered into the "occupancy" of said premises, and continued "in such occupancy" until her conveyance. When the learned trial judge, with his attention fully drawn to the significance of his words, has found that the husband was in possession, and the wife an occupant, merely, by what right shall I, or any of us, reverse his finding into one that the wife was in possession, and the husband only an occupant? We are bound by the finding, and must give it the full and lawful force which belongs to it. If, on a third trial, the fact is found the other way, and should compel a different decision at our hands, it will not be the first time that contradictory findings of fact have enabled ignorance, supposing itself to be wisdom, to charge upon us a seeming inconsistency; but the circumstance will not alter our duty in the least.

A second fact now appears, the absence of which was noted in the prior decision. The answer of the defendant alleges that no consideration was paid to or received by him for "uniting with his wife" in the deed to Mrs. Fisher. But he did not prove that allegation on the trial, for there is no finding of that fact, and not even a request to find it. On the contrary, the deed which he executed is now transcribed in the findings, and it contains the explicit admission that the consideration of $18,500 was "to them in hand paid;" that is, to the two parties,—to the husband and wife both.

At this stage of the case the facts stand thus: That, at the date of the conveyance to Mrs. Fisher neither Coe nor his wife had a valid title to the land; that he was in possession, and his wife occupied the premises with him; that she had color of title, but he not even that; that the two assumed, as joint grantors, to convey the land to Mrs. Fisher; that Coe delivered the possession to her, which was the only estate which either grantor had, or which they could convey; and that Coe shared in the purchase money paid for the grant. On that state of facts, I do not see how it is possible to say that Coe was a stranger to the title, or transferred no estate to which his covenant of warranty could attach. But, before pausing upon that proposition, I should bring into the discussion the third new fact, which makes its appearance for the first time; that is, that, in and by the deed, Coe explicitly, and in terms, covenanted, not only with Mrs. Fisher, but with her "heirs and assigns." In other words, he meant and intended his covenant to protect, not only her, but also those who should come after her by succession to the ownership of the same land. The significance of those words will better appear if we refer back to the early history of these covenants: Originally, the common law did not permit the assignment of things in action, and it followed that a covenant, regarded from the direction of a contract, could not pass beyond the covenantee. But the old warranty seems to have been viewed rather as an incident of, and as belonging to, the estate conveyed, and so attached to that estate as to go with it when transmitted. It could not pass to assigns, as an independent contract, but, by its connection with an estate in land, became transmissible with it. Out of that peculiarity sprang the necessity of privity of estate to enable the subsequent assignee to vouch, or call on his predecessor for protection; but it was an element of the doctrine that neither the heir nor the assign of the grantee could take advantage of the warranty, unless expressly named. Rawle, Covenants for Title, § 208. As was said, if one "warrant land to a man and his heirs without naming assigns, his assignee shall not vouch." Co. Litt. 884b. That rule was not applied when the warrantor, instead of substituting other lands, became bound only to respond in damages; but, while the necessity has disappeared, the actual use of the words continues to indicate the purpose and intent of the warrantor that his covenant shall not stop with the covenantee, but operate for the benefit of his grantees; and though the use of the words, possibly, may not dispense with some privity of estate, they show that the warrantor regarded himself as making, and intending to make, a covenant running with the land, and that, in holding him to that responsibility, we do not put upon him a liability which he did not contemplate. The force belonging to such words is indicated in many recent cases (Nye v. Hoyle, 120 N. Y. 208; Coleman v. Bresnahan, 54 Hun, 622; Hart v. Lyon, 90 N. Y. 663); and while they are more important, and bear more heavily upon the theory that a covenantor having no estate may, by his own special and intended contract, attach his covenant of warranty to the estate of another, so as to run with that estate, yet they are entitled to weight and consideration, also, upon the narrower inquiry whether the defendant here is or is not to be deemed an entire stranger to the title, and they yield an inference which balances somewhat that drawn from the covenant of seisin.

And thus it is apparent that the facts in the present record differ, in material and essential respects, from those presented on the previous appeal. It is certainly the law of this state that one in possession of land, merely, without other actual title, has an estate in the land which he may transfer to a grantee, and which is sufficient to carry with it his covenant of warranty down the line of succession. That was explicitly held in Beddoe v. Wadsworth, 21 Wend. 124; and I have found no case in this state to the contrary, and no reason to doubt the soundness of the doctrine. We have here, then, a situation in which the defendant was in possession of land, and so had an estate in it; where he assumed to transfer it as grantor by deed; where he transferred his possession to the grantee; where he received in exchange some part or the whole of the consideration of the grant; where his wife, who joined in the deed, had no better title than his, whatever he may have thought about it; where he meant and intended that his warranty should run to assigns, and expressed that intention on the face of his covenant. It is impossible, on such a state of facts, to deem him a stranger to the title, and merely an independent covenantor. We must hold that he had and transferred an estate to which his covenant of warranty could and did attach, and in so holding we contravene nothing which was decided on the previous appeal.

Mrs. Fisher, in December of 1869, mortgaged the premises conveyed to her by Coe and wife to the trustees of Sarah M. Mygatt, and in 1871 conveyed the property to Fuller, who in turn conveyed it to Clara B. Leavitt by deed dated in 1874. In November of 1878 the true owners, in an action of ejectment, evicted Mrs. Leavitt, and went into possession. In the following December, suit was brought on the Mygatt mortgage for a foreclosure; and on the sale in 1879 the mortgagees became purchasers, and received the referee's deed. Since the covenants ran with the land, and those of them which were prospective were not broken, and turned into mere rights of action, until after the delivery of the mortgage to the Mygatt trustees, and the deed of the equity of redemption to Fuller and Mrs. Leavitt, it becomes necessary to determine to whom the covenants ran, as between the mortgagees, on the one hand, and the grantees of the mortgagor, on the other. That has been sometimes a difficult and troublesome question, and logically is so yet, although I deem it substantially settled. Under the old system, which regarded the mortgage as transferring to the mortgagee the entire legal estate, leaving in the mortgagor only an equity which courts of law could not recognize, it was necessary to say, and was said, that the covenants running with the land followed the legal estate into the hands of the mortgagee, where it remained entire and complete; and the grantees of the equity, having no legal estate, could have no right to the covenants, which already belonged to another. It was so held in Carlisle v. Blamire, 8 East, 487, but the injustice of the doctrine drew upon the ingenuity of equity to supply a remedy; and where the grantee holding covenants had executed a mortgage, and thereafter, having been evicted from the premises by a paramount title, his grantor and covenantor settled with the mortgagee by paying the mortgage, in full discharge of the covenants, and so assuming to cancel them, the grantee was allowed by a decree in equity to sue the covenantor at law, and the latter was restrained from setting up as a defense, in any manner, the deed or deeds of mortgage which had diverted the covenants from the main line of succession. Thurnton v. Court, 3 De G. M. & G. 293. By this circuitous route the just result was reached of dividing the benefit of the covenants between mortgagee and owner of the equity of redemption according to their respective rights, and the same just distribution is effected under our system by a different process. We regard the mortgagor as retaining the legal estate, and the mortgagee as having a lien upon it for his security. The covenants therefore run to both mortgagee and grantee of mortgagor in proportion to their respective rights, and the covenant is divisible accordingly. A very clear exposition of this doctrine will be found in White v. Whitney, 3 Met. 87, and it has been asserted in this state in Town v. Needham, 3 Paige, 546, 8 L. ed. 269, 24 Am. Dec. 246, and Andrews v. Wolcott, 16 Barb. 25.

By the foreclosure of the mortgage the purchasers at the sale have become, alone, entitled to sue upon the prospective covenants contained in the deed given by Coe, and, on the facts now before us, can successfully maintain the action upon the ground that there does exist between them and the covenantor a privity of estate. Whether, without that, the covenantor would still be bound, upon the theory that by his contract he consciously and intentionally attached his covenants to the land of his wife, and privity of estate with the original covenantee alone is sufficient, it is not necessary, at present, to decide. The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted; costs to abide the event.

*1. The provisions of the constitution

authorizing the organization and control of banks of circulation do not limit the legislative power nor operate to prohibit the enactment of laws imposing reasonable regulations upon banks of deposit and discount.

2. The act providing for the organization and regulation of banks (Laws 1891, chap. 43) is held to be within the scope of the police power of the state, and not an unconstitutional infringement of private rights.

3. The act does not contravene the constitutional provision which requires that "no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title."

ERROR to the District Court for Linn County to review orders dissolving an attachment which had been issued against the property of the banking firm of Hood & Kincaids and overruling motions to discharge the receiver which had been appointed for its property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James D. Snoddy, R. W. Blue, and J. T. Pringle, for plaintiffs in error:

The Act (Sess. Laws 1891, chap. 48) is broader than the title and contains more than one subject.

State v. Barrett, 27 Kan. 218; Weyand v. Stover, 35 Kan. 551; Cherokee County Comrs. v. State, 36 Kan. 339; Cooley, Const. Lim. 176, 178.

The constitution of the state of Kansas gives to the legislature no power to regulate or control banks of discount and deposit.

Pape v. Capitol Bank of Topeka, 20 Kan. 440, 27 Am. Rep. 183.

Article 13 of the Constitution is the expression of the ultimate sovereignty of the state upon the subject of banking. The people by the grant of the power expressed in that article, reserved all other power upon that subject to themselves. Without the grant of such power, no power to regulate or control such banks is possessed by the legislature, except they be corporations, organized under a general law providing for such organizations.

The business of banking is not a franchise, nor does it fall within the police powers of the state.

The right to carry on the business of banking, at common law, belonged to the individual as a right, and might be carried on by an individual or a partnership, in all its various relations, even to the extent of issuing notes as a circulating medium to be used as money, as any other trade, or occupation, or business.

The Constitution of the United States contains no limitation, nor does our state constitution, except as to banks of issue.

Pape v. Capitol Bank of Topeka, 20 Kan. 440, 27 Am. Rep. 183.

Hence the legislature had full power to enact any law which would not infringe upon any natural personal right, and especially could it enact any law which embodied a proper exercise of the police power.

New York has had a bank act regulating the banking business for a great many years, which from People v. Doty, 80 N. Y. 230, and Leavitt v. Blutchford, 17 N. Y. 516, and cases cited, has been repeatedly sustained, and this in part because the individual had accepted the law and voluntarily acted under it, as was true of Hood & Kincaids in this case.

See also Bissell v. Heath, 98 Mich. 472.

In Ryan v. Ray, 105 Ind. 101, it is held that the remedy provided by the banking law can alone be applied.

North Dakota law prohibits private individuals from doing a banking business, and confines that privilege to corporations organized under that act.

In State v. Woodmanse, 11 L. R. A. 420, 1 N. Dak. 246, the court says: "We have been unable to find an authority, and we have searched diligently, which has ever questioned the right of the legislature in the exercise of police power to regulate, restrain, and govern the business of banking."

This law has been assented to, and hence binds the parties.

See also State v. Commercial State Bank, 28 Neb. 677; Stone v. Dodge, 21 L. R. A. 280, 96 Mich. 514.

Johnston, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The firm of Hood & Kincaids engaged in the general banking business at Pleasanton in 1883, and continued in that business, without state regulation, until September, 1891, when, in pursuance of the Banking Law of 1891, the firm transmitted to the bank commissioners the verified statement and report required by that act. The commissioner, finding that the bank had complied with the provisions of law, issued a certificate to Hood & Kincaids, authorizing them to do a banking business at Pleasanton, and they continued to transact business under the supervision of the commissioner until July, 1893, when the bank commissioner, upon examination, found the bank to be insolvent. He at once took possession of the property, assets, and books of the bank, and, on July 19th, the attorney-general began an action in the district court, and secured the appointment of O. E. Morse as receiver. The firm of Hood & Kincaids appeared and admitted the insolvency as alleged, and consented to the appointment. Soon after the appointment of the receiver, a number of the creditors of the firm of Hood & Kincaids caused attachments to be levied upon the property in the hands of the receiver. Mu-tions to discharge the attachments were made by the receiver, and the attaching creditors also filed motions asking that the order appointing the receiver be set aside, the receiver discharged, and the property in his hands turned over to the sheriff, to be held by him under the attachments. The motions to discharge the attachments were sustained, and those made to set aside the order appointing the receiver were overruled. The attaching creditors complain of these rulings, and bring them here for review.

The validity of the Banking Law of 1891, in pursuance of which the receiver was placed in charge of the insolvent bank, is the principal question to be settled here. It is contended that the act is objectionable on several constitutional grounds, but the main one is that it authorizes an undue interference with private business. It provides for the organization of corporate banks, and for the regulation of all banking business, except that which is done by national banks, whether conducted by corporations, partnerships, or individuals. It creates the office of bank commissioner, and provides that all those engaged in the banking business shall make reports to him of their resources and liabilities, requires them to submit to inspection and investigation in order to ascertain their financial condition, and prescribes methods of business intended to protect the depositors and patrons of such banks. Laws 1891, chap. 48. An examination of the provisions of this act shows that no one is prohibited from engaging in the business of banking. No special privileges or immunities are conferred, and no distinction is made between corporate, partnership, or individual banks. All are permitted to engage in the business, and all are subject to the same control, and to like penalties for violation of its provisions. There is no room for the contention that article 18 of the Constitution withholds from the legislature power to regulate and control banks of discount and deposit. It was held in Pape v. Capitol Bank of Topeka, 20 Kan. 440, 27 Am. Rep. 188, that this article of the constitution applies only to banks of issue, and does not prohibit the legislature from creating banks of deposit and discount. The provision of the constitution authorizing the organization and control of banks of circulation is not the end of the legislative power. Its power is supreme, except where it is restrained by the fundamental law, and the constitutional limitations as to banks of issue do not operate to prohibit the legislature from organizing and regulating banks of deposit and discount, and providing for the safe-keeping or loaning of money by such banks. The right to organize and control corporate banks is conceded, but it is contended that the banking business is not a franchise, but belongs to all individual citizens as a common right, the exercise of which cannot be denied or subjected to police regulation. The argument and authorities cited by counsel for plaintiff in error are mainly directed to the contention that the legislature cannot withhold from individuals the right to engage in banking, and confer the privilege alone upon incorporated companies. This contention is not a matter of concern at this time, as our statute does not pretend to limit the business to incorporated companies nor to discriminate between corporations and individuals. The question with us is whether the banking business is of such a character as to warrant the legislature, in the exercise of the state's police power, to impose reasonable regulations upon the means and methods by which it is conducted. There are many occupations and lines of private business which the legislature, in the exercise of the internal police power, may rightfully regulate. Tiedeman, in his work on Limitations of Police Power (page 194), says: "It will probably not be disputed that every one has a right to pursue in a lawful manner any lawful calling which he may select. The state can neither compel him to pursue any particular calling nor prohibit him from engaging in any lawful business, provided he does so in a lawful manner. It is equally recognized as beyond dispute that the state, in the exercise of its police power, is, as a general proposition, authorized to subject all occupations to a reasonable regulation wherever regulation is required for the protection of public interest or for the public welfare." We have frequent instances of the exercise of the police power to prevent imposition and extortion, and of the regulation of employments, and also of business, of a quasi public nature. By virtue of the police power, regulations have been imposed on the practice of law, medicine, and dentistry, as well as upon bakers, millers, and wharfingers, and it has been accepted as a proper exercise of the police power to regulate pawnbrokers, junk shops, and loan offices. Inspection laws, and those regulating the weighing of commodities offered for sale, are generally regarded as suitable and valid regulations of police. 18 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 747-759. The right to regulate and control the business of insurance, as well as that conducted by mills and warehouses, is no longer doubted. Enactments controlling the loaning of money, and regulating the rate of interest upon the same, have been sanctioned from the earliest times, and the nature of the business done by banks in dealing in money, receiving deposits for safe-keeping, discounting paper, and loaning money, is such, and is so affected with a public interest, as to justify reasonable regulation for the protection of the people. The confidential and trust relations which exist between the bank and its patrons, and the difficulty that depositors and those dealing with the bank necessarily encounter in detecting irregular practices and in ascertaining the real financial conditions of banks, are sufficient to justify inspection and control. Those engaged in the business invite all in the community to deposit their funds with them, which, when obtained, is largely used for their profit. The numerous instances where the earnings and funds of people so deposited are dissipated and lost shows the necessity for measures to protect the people from imposition, extortion, and fraud. For this reason, most of the states have enacted laws recognizing banking as a quasi public business, and regulating the same to a greater or less extent. A well-known author, in his treatise on Banking, uses the following language: "At common law, the right of banking pertains equally to every member of the community. Its very exercise can be restricted only by legislative enactment, but that it legally can be thus restricted has never been questioned." 1 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 13. The same subject was considered in the recent case of State v. Woodmanse, 1 N. Dak. 246, 11 L. R. A. 420, where it was said that "the business of banking, by reason of its very intimate relations to the fiscal affairs of the people and the revenues of the state, is and has ever been considered a proper subject of control, and strictly within the domain of the internal police power of every state. As a matter of fact, we have been unable to find an authority—and we have searched diligently—which has ever questioned the right of the legislature, in the exercise of police power, to regulate, restrain, and govern the business of banking." See also, People v. Utica Ins. Co. 15 Johns. 858, 8 Am. Dec. 243; People v. Bartow, 6 Cow. 290; Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 9; State v. Williams, 8 Tex. 265; Nance v. Hemphill, 1 Ala. 551; People v. Brewster, 4 Wend. 498.

The authority principally relied upon by counsel for the plaintiff in error is State v. Scougal, (8. Dak.) 15 L. R. A. 477. The latter case is in conflict with State v. Woodmanse, supra, in holding that the legislature may prohibit private banking, and may inaugurate a system for the state in which the business is made an exclusively corporate franchise, to be carried on only by those who become incorporated, and are willing to subject their business to the restraints and safeguards deemed to be necessary. In State v. Scougal it was decided that the business of banking was not a franchise at common law, and was not made such by the constitution, and, further, that it belonged to the citizens of the country generally by common right; and the legislature could not, under the police power of the state, prohibit an individual from engaging in the business nor confer the privilege exclusively upon corporations. As no exclusive franchise has been conferred and no discrimination made against individuals or private banks in our statutes, we are not required to determine which of the conflicting theories should prevail. Even in the Scougal Case, which holds strictly against any discrimination in favor of corporate banks, it is held that, where the law applies to individuals and corporations alike, reasonable regulations may be imposed. In the course of the decision, the court remarked: "But, assuming that the business of banking we are now considering is clothed with such a public use that it may be controlled by the state,—and we think it is so affected with a public interest,—still it does not follow that the citizen may be deprived of the right to carry on the business. This like any other business may be subjected to reasonable regulations, which shall alike apply to all citizens and corporations." We readily conclude that the regulation of the banking business is clearly within the legislative power, and that the act passed cannot be regarded as an unconstitutional interference with individual rights.

Another objection is that the title of the act contains more than one subject, and contravenes section 16 article 2, of the State Constitution. The title is, "An act providing for the organization and regulation of banks, and prescribing penalties for violations of the provisions of this act." In a broad sense, it is an enactment concerning the business of banking, and all of the provisions are fairly comprehended within this general subject. As has been held, this constitutional provision is not to be construed in any narrow or technical sense, but liberally on one side, so as to guard against the abuse intended to be prevented by it, and liberally on the other side, so as not to embarrass or restrict needed legislation. State v. Barrett, 27 Kan. 213; State v. Curtis, 20 Kan. 884; Cherokee County Comrs. v. State, 86 Kan. 337; State v. Haskell County Comrs. 40 Kan. 65; State v. Sanders, 42 Kan. 226; State v. Kansas City, 50 Kan. 521.

Having determined that the act is valid, it follows that the rulings of the court sustaining the motions to discharge the attachment and overruling the motions to discharge the receiver will be affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

1. The competency as a witness of a child over four years of age is a question addressed to the discretion of the trial court.
2. The fact that a child is of tender years will not prevent its testimony.

if competent, from being sufficient to support a conviction of an indecent assault, when all the corroborative testimony has been given that is practically procurable.

3. Gross lewdness is "open" within the meaning of Rev. Stat., § 4579, if committed in the presence of another person, even if that is a child of tender years, too innocent to be offended by it.

(May 23, 1894.)

REPORT by the Circuit Court for Langlade County for the Opinion of the Supreme Court of certain questions which arose during a trial which resulted in the conviction of defendant of open and gross lewdness and lascivious behavior. Answers returned adverse to defendant.

Statement by Newman, J.:

Reported by the circuit court for Langlade county, under section 4721, Rev. Stat. The report is as follows:

"At the September term, 1893, of the above court, the above-named defendant, Andrew Juneau, was convicted of 'open and gross lewdness and lascivious behavior,' under the provisions of section 4579, Rev. Stat. The offense was alleged to have been committed on the 14th day of December, 1892, in a building occupied by the defendant; no one being present at the time except the defendant and a little girl named Clara Brown, who was at that time about four years and nine months old, and who was about five years and five months old at the time of the trial. The alleged offense consisted of the indecent exposure of defendant's person to said child, and the commission of an indecent assault upon her. The defendant was convicted upon the testimony of said child, corroborated by that of her mother, and a physician who was called to examine her a short time after the alleged assault. Certain questions of law having arisen during the trial, which, in the opinion of the presiding judge, are so important and doubtful as to require the decision of the supreme court, now, therefore, I John Goodland, judge of the tenth judicial circuit, do hereby certify to the supreme court of the state of Wisconsin (said defendant consenting thereto) the said questions for decision, as follows: First question: Did the circuit court err in permitting the child, Clara Brown, to testify in this case? Second question: Can a conviction for criminal offense be sustained upon the testimony (with some corroboration) of a child who was under the age of five years at the time the offense is alleged to have been committed? Third question: Is an act of gross lewdness 'open,' within the meaning of section 4579, Rev. Stat., when committed in a private place, and when no one is present except the defendant and the person upon whom the act is alleged to have been committed? A copy of the testimony taken and the proceedings had upon said trial is hereunto annexed."

Messrs. J. L. O'Connor, Atty-Gen., and J. M. Clancey, Asst. Atty-Gen., for the State:

If the child appears to have sufficient natural intelligence and to have been so instructed as to comprehend the nature and effect of an oath, he is permitted to testify whatever his age may be. The question is: Is the court satisfied the child was sufficiently conscious of the duty to speak the truth, to permit the reception of his evidence?

Washburn v. People, 10 Mich. 372; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 387; McGuire v. People, 44 Mich. 2nd 8, 38 Am. Rep. 265; McGuff v. State, 63 Ala. 150.

In 1 East, P. C. 441, it is said: "Indeed," adds Mr. Justice Blackstone [4 Bl. Com. 214], "it seems now to be settled that in these cases (offenses against chastity) infants of any age are to be heard, and if they have an idea of an oath,—to be also sworn."

King v. Brazier, 1 Leach, C. C. 199; Brazier's Case, 1 East, P. C. 448.

We must presume in favor of action of the trial court for the reason that the court had the proposed witness in its presence, and was therefore enabled to estimate to some extent her capacity from her appearance, and the manner of her replies in her examination.

Newman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It seems to be the settled law that, after four years of age, a child is not incompetent to testify as a witness by reason of any rule of law which excludes him. Whether a child above that age is competent to testify depends upon his intelligence, which is to be determined by the trial court, by examination of the child in court. The question is addressed to the discretion of the trial court. Its determination on such examination is final, except in a clear case of the abuse of its discretion. "It may be regarded as well settled that whenever there is intelligence enough to observe and to narrate, there, a child (a due sense of the obligation of an oath being shown) can be admitted to testify." Whart. Ev. 3d ed. § 398. "Age, at least after four years are past, does not touch competency; and the question is one of intelligence, which, whenever a doubt arises, the court will determine to its own satisfaction, by examining the infant on his knowledge of the obligation of an oath, and the religious and secular penalties for perjury." Id. § 399. "It will require a strong case to sustain a reversal of the ruling of the court examining such a witness." Id. § 400. See cases cited in the brief of the attorney-general; also, State v. Morea, 2 Ala. 275; Wade v. State, 50 Ala. 164; Blackwell v. State, 11 Ind. 196; State v. Denis, 19 La. Ann. 119; People v. Bernal, 10 Cal. 66; State v. Whittier, 21 Me. 341, 38 Am. Dec. 242; State v. Le Blanc, 3 Brev. 339; State v. Jackson, 9 Or. 457. Whether the trial court determined rightly the questions of the competency of the witness is not presented here. That is a question of fact. Only questions of law are to be reported, under the statute, or considered by this court. State v. Gross, 62 Wis. 41; State v. Cornhauser, 74 Wis. 42. The court, being satisfied of the competency of the witness, did not err in permitting her to testify in the case.

2. Ordinarily, the testimony of one competent witness is sufficient to sustain a conviction. There are crimes for which it is not competent to convict upon the uncorroborated testimony of one witness. These are exceptions from the general rule, created either by statute, or some established rule of the common law. Except in these excepted cases, the testimony of one witness answers at law. Even the testimony of an accomplice is sufficient (Black v. State, 59 Wis. 471), and that even in a capital case United States v. Neverson, 1 Mackey, 152; United States v. Bickler, Id. 341. The weight of the evidence is for the jury. If they are satisfied by it, beyond a reasonable doubt, it is legally sufficient. Even in cases of rape, there is no inflexible rule which requires corroboration of the complainant's testimony. Such corroboration is expected, and its absence seriously impairs the case of the prosecution. But the law itself is satisfied with such corroboration as is practically procurable; else, many crimes could be perpetrated with impunity. Whart. Crim. L. 9th ed. 565. It is, to a great extent, in the discretion of the trial court, in most cases, whether corroboration shall be required, and how much. Ingnill v. State, 48 Wis. 649; Black v. State, supra. Under the direction of the court, an intelligent jury are not likely to err in giving undue credit and force to the testimony. If that should happen, it is always within the power of the court to correct such a mistake by a new trial. It appears by the report that there was some corroboration of the principal witness. Whether the whole evidence supports the conviction cannot be answered here. State v. Gross, supra. The court being satisfied by its examination that the witness was competent to testify, and that practically all the corroborative testimony which was practically procurable had been produced, and being satisfied of the truth of the verdict, the conviction is lawful, and should be sustained.

8. The act alleged against the defendant is an act of "open and gross lewdness," within the meaning of the statute. The statute punishes, not public, but open, lewdness. The phrase "open and gross lewdness" is not equivalent to the phrase "gross lewdness in an open place." The word "open" has no reference to place at all, nor to number of people. It is used simply to define a quality of the act of lewdness. It is "open lewdness" as opposed to "secret" lewdness. It defines the same act, regardless whether it is committed in presence of one or of many. The offense may be committed by the intentional act of exposing one's person indecently in the presence of one person, to whom it is offensive, as well as in the presence of many persons. It could not change the quality of the act that it was committed in the presence of a child of tender years,—too innocent to be offended by it. The benignity of the law would neither presume nor permit the consent of such a child to such an act. Fowler v. State, 5 Day, 81; Grisham v. State, 2 Yerg. 589; State v. Millard, 18 Vt. 574, 46 Am. Dec. 170; Com. v. Wardell, 128 Mass. 52, 35 Am. Rep. 357.

The first question is answered in the negative. The second and third questions are answered in the affirmative. It will be so certified to the circuit court.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

C. Sumner BURROUGHS

v.

William H. EASTMAN, Plff. in Err.

(....Mich.....)

1. An arrest without a warrant may be authorized by the legislature for other misdemeanors committed in presence of an officer as well as for breach of the peace.
2. The constitutional requirement of due process of law is not violated by a statute extending the right to arrest without warrant for crime committed in presence of an officer to offenses for which such arrest was not authorized when the constitution was adopted.
3. Constitutional provisions against issuing a warrant without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, do not apply to an arrest without a warrant.
4. One who directed an arrest and is found guilty of false imprisonment cannot complain that the one who actually made the arrest was found not guilty.

(July 10, 1894.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kent County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged false imprisonment. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. Edwin F. Uhl, for plaintiff in error:

In Mayo v. Wilson, 1 N. H. 53, the court said: "By the 15th article of the Bill of Rights prefixed to the constitution, it is declared that no subject shall be arrested, imprisoned, . . . exiled, or deprived of his liberty or estate but by the judgment of his peers or by the law of the land. Therefore, all warrants . . . to arrest a person for examination or trial in prosecution for criminal matters are contrary to this right if the cause or foundation of them be not previously supported by oath or affirmation."

Coke says the words "per legem terra" in

NOTE—As to the right to arrest without warrant, see note to State v. Hunter (N. C.), 8 L. R. A. 529, 34 L. R. A.

Magna Charta, and the words "due process of law" in the Statute of 87 Edw. III., chap. 8, mean the same thing.

2 Co. Inst. 50.

An arrest without writ and without warrant, if authorized by the common or statute law of the land, is an arrest by due process of law, and an arrest by the law of the land, within the meaning of the constitution, as much as an arrest made by virtue of a warrant from a magistrate.

If a statute make use of a word, the meaning of which is well known to the common law, the word shall be understood in the statute in the same sense it was understood at the common law.

Smith v. Harmon, 6 Mod. 148.

The clause in our constitution now under consideration happens to be a literal translation from Magna Charta, chap. 20.

2 Co. Inst. 45.

Sullivan, in his lectures, 402, has a commentary on this part of Magna Charta. He says that a process of law for the purpose of an arrest is two-fold, either by the king's writ or by what is called a warrant in law. He then says that a warrant in law is two fold, viz., (1) a warrant in deed by authority of a legal magistrate, or (2) that which each private person is invested with and may exercise. He then enumerated the cases where the law warrants a private person to arrest and imprison another. 1. If a man is present when another commits treason, felony, or notorious breach of the peace, he has a right instantly to arrest and commit him lest he should escape. 2. If an affray be made to the breach of the peace any person may, during the continuance of the affray by warrant in law restrain any of the offenders; but if the affray be over, there must an express warrant. 3. If one man dangerously wound another, any person may arrest him, that he be safely kept till it be known whether the person shall die or not. 4. Suspicion, also, when it is violent and strong, is in many cases a good cause of imprisonment, but he who arrests on suspicion must take care that his cause of suspicion be such as will bear the test, for otherwise he may be punishable for false imprisonment. 5. A watchman may arrest a night walker at unseasonable hours, by the common law. But with respect to persons arrested by private authority, there must be an information on oath before a magistrate, and a commitment thereon in a reasonable time, which is esteemed twenty-four hours, otherwise the person is to be no longer detained. Coke in his commentary upon Magna Charta, gives the same explanation.

2 Co. Inst. 52. See also Hawk. P. C. 115; Comyns, Dig. Imprisonment, H. 4; 2 Roll. 559.

An arrest, if authorized by the statute or common law, though without writ or warrant in deed, has always been considered in England as warranted per legem terra.

Plaintiff was engaged in the actual violation of an ordinance of the common council of the city in the presence of the defendants, and therefore they had authority in law to arrest 24 L. R. A.

him without a warrant, and to take him before the police court to be dealt with according to law.

An arrest without process is justified by common-law principles in cases of misdemeanor.

Rez v. Bootie, 2 Burr. 864.

The decisions of the supreme court of this state do not hold a contrary doctrine.

Drennan v. People, 10 Mich. 169; Quinn v. Heisel, 40 Mich. 576; Re Way, 41 Mich. 299; People v. Barts, 53 Mich. 493; Davis v. Burgess, 54 Mich. 514, 53 Am. Rep. 828; Robison v. Miner, 68 Mich. 549; Pinkerton v. Verberg, 7 L. R. A. 507, 73 Mich. 573.

Mr. James E. McBride, for defendant in error:

There are many loose general expressions made by the courts, which would indicate that arrest without warrant might be made in all cases of misdemeanor committed in view of the officer, but these cases were, invariably, cases of breaches of the peace, and referring to them as misdemeanors the courts had in view only the facts of the cases considered.

Cook v. Neethroote, 6 Car. & P. 741; Fox v. Gaunt, 8 Barn. & Ad. 798; Hovell v. Jackson, 6 Car. & P. 728; Rez v. Bright, 4 Car. & P. 287; Levy v. Edwards, 1 Car. & P. 40; Timothy v. Simpson, 5 Tyrw. 244; Baynes v. Brewster, 2 Q. B. 876; Reg. v. Walker, 28 L. J. M. C. 123; Reg. v. Light, 8 Jur. N. S. 1180; Derecourt v. Corbishley, 5 El. & Bl. 188; Bowditch v. Balchin, 5 Exch. 878; Coupey v. Henley, 2 Esp. 540; Osborne v. Veitch, 1 Fost. & F. 817.

From the above cases it will clearly appear that the right to arrest without warrant is confined to such cases as breach of the peace committed in view, and felonies or suspicion of felony.

By "peace" as used in the law in this connection is meant the tranquillity enjoyed by the citizens of a municipality or community where good order reigns among its members.

It is the natural right of all persons in political society, and any intentional violation of that right is a "breach of the peace."

Davis v. Burgess, 54 Mich. 517, 53 Am. Rep. 828.

It must not be forgotten that there can be no arrest without due process of law. An arrest without warrant has never been lawful, except in cases where the public security requires it; and this has only been recognized in felony, and in breaches of the peace committed in view of the officer.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for false imprisonment. The plaintiff was, by defendant's directions, arrested while engaged in giving a performance at a theater in the city of Grand Rapids on Sunday evening. There existed an ordinance of the city of Grand Rapids relative to shows which prohibited a person or company giving theatrical exhibitions on the first day of the week. The charter of the city provides that police officers, in addition to the power and authority possessed by them at common law and under the laws of the state in matters of a criminal nature, shall have the power to arrest without process all persons who shall, in the presence of the arresting officer, be engaged in the violation of the ordinances of the common council of the city, and that the police officer may detain such persons in custody until complaint shall be made and process issued for their arrest and trial. It will be seen, therefore, that, so far as the legislative power can go, it has been exercised to authorize an arrest without warrant for an offense against the ordinance of the city which is committed in the presence of the officer. It is insisted, however, that the act which attempts to clothe the officer with this power is unconstitutional. This court has repeatedly held that, in the absence of any statutory power or authority, an officer cannot arrest except on suspicion of felony, or in case of an actual breach of peace committed in the presence of the arresting officer. See Way's Case, 41 Mich. 304, 52 Am. Rep. 828; Davis v. Burgess, 54 Mich. 514; Quinn v. Heisel, 40 Mich. 576; Peonle v. Johnson, 86 Mich. 176, 13 L. R. A. 168. But whether the legislature may extend the right to the officer to arrest for other misdemeanors, not amounting to a breach of the peace, has not been directly passed upon, unless it be in the case of Robison v. Miner, 68 Mich. 549. In People v. Johnson, 86 Mich. 179, 13 L. R. A. 168, the subject is referred to, but as the record was not in shape to present the question, it was left undecided. In Quinn v. Heisel, 40 Mich. 578, Mr. Justice Marton said: "We are not at present prepared to say that an ordinance of the city of Grand Rapids could authorize arrests without process in cases not justified by common-law principles." But this statement in this case was mere dictum, and, if the quere suggested had been answered in the negative, it would not necessarily follow that the legislature of the state might not confer a power which the common council of the city, under the charter then in force, could not have conferred. In Robison v. Miner, it must be conceded, language is employed which might be construed as prohibiting the power of arrest. The statute under consideration was Act No. 318 of the Laws of 1887, which contained the peculiar provision that "any person found in the act of violating any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a breach of the peace and punished accordingly; and the arrest therefor may be without process, and this punishment shall be taken to be in excess of all other manner of punishment in this act provided for violations of the provisions of this section. All officers authorized to make arrests for a breach of the peace shall have like power to make arrests under the provisions of this section as in other cases of a breach of the peace." These provisions are peculiar and incongruous. It seemed to have been an attempt on the part of the legislature to confer the power of arrest by a process of first declaring that to be a breach of the peace which is not such in fact, and by further providing that a party might be punished for such breach of the peace in addition to and beyond the punishment provided by the same statute. The conclusion that these provisions could not be maintained, in view of the constitutional provisions that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense, was undoubtedly correct. As was well said by Mr. Justice Campbell, in rendering the opinion of the court, "This statute is practically, if carried out, a general warrant itself, directing all officers to visit houses and business places without other authority, and make searches and arrests and close up places of business on their own well or ill founded notion that the law has been violated." But, in the course of this opinion, Justice Campbell used language which seems to favor the contention of plaintiff here, as follows: "The constitution prohibits interference with persons or property without due process of law. The proceedings under this statute are all highly penal and treated expressly as criminal proceedings. The constitution expressly prohibits the issue of warrants of search or seizure of persons or property except on a sworn showing, which, it has always been held, must be of facts, on personal knowledge, such as would establish the legal probability of the cause of complaint. If the legislature could evade this by providing for seizures and searches without legal warrant, the provision would be useless."

As to the first provision of the constitution referred to in the discussion, it means no more than that a person shall not be deprived of liberty except by the law of the land. As to the latter provision, namely, section 26 of article 6, which provides that "no warrant to search any place or to seize any person or things shall issue without describing them nor without probable cause supported by oath or affirmation," we are constrained to say that this section is not susceptible of the construction which, by implication, is placed upon it in the opinion of Mr. Justice Campbell. The same provision was considered by the supreme court of Alabama in the case of Williams v. State, 44 Ala. 43, and a contention that such provision prohibited an arrest without warrant was concisely disposed of as follows: "The federal and state constitutions both provide that no warrant shall issue to search any place, or to seize any person or thing, without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation. As a warrant is the process upon which arrests are usually made, and it cannot be issued without oath, the corollary has been drawn that there can be no arrest without a warrant. The popular error on the subject is our excuse for the assertion of the truism that it is the issue of the warrant, without oath or affirmation, which is forbidden, and not the arrest without a warrant." The statute under consideration in that case authorized an arrest by a policeman without a warrant, on any day and at any time, for any public offense committed, or a breach of the peace threatened, in his presence. It may further be said that, if the constitutional provision last quoted is to be construed as might be implied from the language employed by Mr. Justice Campbell, it would exclude all arrests without warrant. The right which existed at common law to arrest for offenses committed in the presence of the officer has been too often recognized since the adoption of our constitution to be open to question. Mr. Justice Campbell uses the further language: "So far as arrests are concerned, a similar principle applies. Under our system we have repeatedly decided, in accordance with constitutional principles as construed everywhere, that no arrest can be made without warrant, except in cases of felony, or in cases of breaches of the peace committed in the presence of the arresting officer. This exception in cases of breaches of the peace has only been allowed by reason of the immediate danger to the safety of the community against crimes of violence, and it was confined, even in such cases, to instances where the violence was committed in the presence of the officer." This language embodies a correct statement of the rule of common law, but, if it is sought to extend its application to a case where the legislature has authorized the arrest without warrant for offenses other than breaches of the peace committed in the view of the arresting officer, we do not find the contention supported by authority. In Bishop's Criminal Procedure (sec. 184) it is said: "The right of arrest by officers of the peace is more or less enlarged by statutory regulations in the several states, as well as, of late, in England; or, if not enlarged, defined. A statute enlarging the right,—that is, in restraint of personal liberty,—is to be strictly construed. But statutes of this sort are generally held to be constitutional." In Roberts v. State, 14 Mo. 133, 55 Am. Dec. 97, the power of the municipality to provide by ordinance for the arrest of vagrants without warrant was sustained. The same ruling was made in the case of Bryan v. Bates, 15 Ill. 87, and Main v. McCarty, Id. 441. In Massachusetts the legislature has from time to time provided by statute for the arrest of persons guilty of a particular offense, including the offense of selling liquor contrary to law, and the offense of drunkenness, and the power of arrest without warrant for the commission of the offense has been repeatedly sustained. See Jon's v. Root, 6 Gray, 435; Mason v. Lathrop, 7 Gray, 354; Com. v. Cheney, 141 Mass. 102, 55 Am. Rep. 448. See also, Davis v. American Soc. for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, 75 N. Y. 362. In White v. Kent, 11 Ohio St. 550, a statutory provision which conferred the right upon police officers to arrest without process for violations of the city charter not amounting to breaches of the peace was upheld. It was said: "It is evident that many ordinances necessary for good order and general convenience, as well as for the preservation of morals and decency, would be almost nugatory if offenders could only be arrested upon warrant." In Davis v. American Soc. for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, supra, it was held that a statute authorizing an arrest, without process, of one guilty of cruelty to animals, was valid. In O'Connor v. Bucklin, 59 N. H. 589, a statute authorizing an officer, upon view of any crime or breach of peace or offense against the police of towns, to arrest without warrant, was sustained. In St. v. Cantigny, 34 Minn. 1, a statute of the state authorizing any peace officer to arrest without warrant for a "public offense committed or attempted in his presence" was construed and upheld, and it was held that an arrest without warrant for such public offense was authorized, even if the offense did not amount to a breach of the peace. See Wahl v. Walton, 30 Minn. 508. See also, Berille v. State, 16 Tex. App. 70; Wiltse v. Holt, 95 Ind. 469; Traffe v. Slein, 11 Mo. App. 507; Smith v. Donely, 66 Ill. 465; Scirole v. Neeces, 47 Ind. 239; Jacobs v. State, 28 Tex. App. 79; Butolph v. Blust, 41 How. Pr. 431; Billard v. State, 43 Ohio St. 840; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 210, 211, 214, and cases cited in notes.

It will be seen that the question has arisen in many of our sister states, and the power to authorize arrest on view for offenses not amounting to breaches of the peace has been affirmed. Our attention has been called to no case, nor have we in our research found one, in which the contrary doctrine has been asserted. We think that, while the language in Robison v. Miner may furnish justification for the contention which is made by the plaintiff here, the language which we have referred to, bearing that construction, was not necessary to a determination of the question there involved, and should not be followed. The right to arrest without warrant applies as well to felonies made so by statute after the adoption of the constitution as to offenses which are felonies at the common law, and this without express legislation providing for such arrest. Firestone v. Rice, 71 Mich. 877. This holding is wholly inconsistent with the claim that what is due process of law must be determined by what arrest without warrant was permissible at the time of the adoption of the constitution. It is illogical to say that the legislature may, by defining a particular offense as a felony, or providing for its punishment as such, authorize an arrest without warrant for such offense not committed in the presence of the officer, and yet it may not by statute authorize arrest for a misdemeanor committed in the presence of the officer. The necessity may be as great in the one case as in the other, and the case of Firestone v. Rice illustrates that the rule is not irrevocably or inflexibly fixed by the state of the law as it existed prior to the adoption of the constitution. The same provision of the constitution which protects the person protects the property from invasion without due process of law, and yet statutes which have prescribed what use of property shall constitute a nuisance, and authorized its summary destruction when so used, have been upheld by the courts (Hart v. Albany, 9 Wend. 571, 24 Am. Dec. 165; Meeker v. Van Rensselaer, 13 Wend. 397; American Print Works v. Lawrence, 21 N. J. L. 248), and fully approved by the Federal Supreme Court in the recent case of Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 134, 38 L. ed. 385. See also People v. Brooks (decided at the present term, (Mich.) 59 N. W. Rep. 444.

2. Appellant also contends that the verdict of the jury finding the defendant guilty should not be allowed to stand because of the inconsistency in the verdict rendered. The actual arrest, which was made by the direction of the defendant Eastman, was made by one Hurley, lieutenant of police. Hurley was joined with defendant Eastman, and upon the trial Eastman was found guilty, and Hurley not guilty. It does not appear whether the plaintiff has rested content with the verdict in favor of Hurley, but, while it may be that the jury rendered an inconsistent verdict, it does not follow that defendant Eastman can take advantage of it. The plaintiff could have nolle prosequi the case as against Hurley at any stage, and have proceeded to try the issue as against Eastman. The plaintiff might, after verdict, have moved for a new trial as against defendant Hurley, and a different result might be reached on another trial. We think the point should be overruled.

The circuit judge, however, erred in instructing the jury that the legislature has not the power to authorize an arrest for an offense not amounting to a breach of the peace, without warrant, if committed in view of the officer. For this reason, the judgment will be reversed, with costs; and a new trial ordered.

Grant and Hooker, JJ., concurred with Montgomery, J.

McGrath, Ch. J., dissenting:

I am not prepared to overrule the doctrine of Roberts v. Miner, 68 Mich. 549. The statute under consideration in that case, as in the present case, empowered officers to arrest without process, and it was with reference to that provision that the language of Mr. Justice Campbell, referred to by my Brother Montgomery, was used, and there is no room for saying that that language was unnecessary to a determination of the question there involved. The evident intent of the legislature in the provision under consideration was to bring the offense aimed at within the category of breaches of the peace, in order to subject it to the incidents of offenses of that class. In Allor v. Wayne County Auditors, 43 Mich. 76-97, Mr. Justice Campbell says: "The constitution has also provided that no one shall be deprived of liberty without due process of law, and has provided that no warrant shall issue except upon oath or affirmation establishing probable cause. It has been settled for centuries, and the doctrine has been recognized here, that except in cases of reasonable belief of treason or felony, or breach of the peace committed in presence of an officer, there is no due process of law without a warrant issued by a court or magistrate upon a proper showing or finding." As was said by Mr. Justice Cooley in Weimer v. Bunbury, 30 Mich. 201-218: "The constitution makes no attempt to define such process, but assumes that custom and law have already settled what it is. Even in judicial proceedings, we do not ascertain from the constitution what is lawful process, but we test their action by principles which were before the constitution, and the benefit of which we assume that the constitution was intended to perpetuate. . . . The bills of rights in the American constitutions have not been drafted for the introduction of new law, but to secure old principles against abrogation or violation. They are conservatory instruments, rather than reformatory, and they assume that the existing principles of the common law are ample for the protection of individual rights, when once incorporated in the fundamental law, and thus secured against violation. We are, therefore, of necessity, driven to an examination of the previous condition of things, if we would understand the meaning of due process of law, as the constitution employs the term."

It may well be asked what principle was perpetuated or secured against abrogation or violation, if what constitutes due process of law is made to depend upon the will of the legislature as expressed in any one of our many and varied municipal charters. If this constitutional provision be not regarded as a limitation of the power of the legislature, then the statute is in each instance the test of authority, and the constitutional provision is without office or force. That provision is not necessary to support or protect the statute. The latter is to be construed in subordination to the constitution, and is to be tested by that instrument. The term "due process of law" had a well-settled meaning when the constitution was adopted, of which the framers of that instrument must be presumed to have had knowledge, and with reference to which it must be presumed that they acted. Subsequent legislation cannot change the meaning or effect of a constitutional provision. A statute may provide for a removal from office, or for the taxation or taking of property without notice or hearing, but, although such would be a process provided by law, it will not be contended that a removal or a taking thereunder would not be a plain violation of the constitution. Such statutory process, when tested by principles which were before the constitution, would be found to lack essential requisites of due process. The constitution nowhere in express terms speaks of notice or a day in court, but, notwithstanding, these are universally recognized as essential incidents of due process. In Weimer v. Bunbury, supra, Mr. Justice Cooley subjected the process under consideration in that case to the test of settled rules which antedated the constitution. Any other test would violate a cardinal rule of constitutional interpretation, subject provisions designed for the protection of persons and property to legislative modification, and make the meaning of a term employed in the fundamental law, which term had, at the time of the adoption of the constitution, a well-known signification, depend upon the language used in a municipal charter or ordinance.

The facts in many of the cases cited by my Brother Montgomery bring the cases clearly within rules as laid down by this court. In State v. Cantieny, 34 Minn. 1, respondent and his companions were intoxicated, noisy, and disorderly in the night-time, in a public street. An officer undertook to disperse them, and a scuffle ensued, during which an attempt was made to take away from the officer his baton. He undertook to arrest one of them, and was shot. Not only were the parties guilty of a disturbance of public tranquillity, but of a breach of peace against the officer. In Beville v. State, 16 Tex. App. 70, the party was intoxicated in a public place, and in the act of committing a breach of the peace. In Willie v. Holt, 95 Ind. 469, the officer, having knowledge that appellee had previously threatened the life of one Bogart, and hearing the disturbance in Bogart's office, and seeing the appellee emerge from the office in an intoxicated condition, wild with excitement and anger, arrested him. In Bryan v. Bates, 15 Ill. 97, it was held that the powers of cities and their ministerial officers were not changed by the new constitution. The arrest was of a person who was drunk, and was disturbing the peace by violent, tumultuous language, calculated to provoke a breach of the peace. In Scirale v. Nevees, 47 Ind. 289, the party arrested was in the public streets in a state of gross intoxication, unable to walk or stand without support, and when found was prostrated upon the sidewalk, and was of course an actual obstruction to travel, a disgusting and offensive spectacle, and the situation was calculated to attract a curious crowd. Com. v. Cheney, 141 Mass. 103, was a case of like character. In O'Connor v. Bucklin, 59 N. H. 589, the arrest was made under a statute providing that any officer, upon view of any crime or breach of the peace, or offense against the police, might arrest without warrant, but it does not appear just what the offense charged was. In Willie v. Holt, supra; Wahl v. Walton, 80 Minn. 506, and Taaffe v. Slevin, 11 Mo. App. 607, there had been an actual breach of the peace. Bouvier defines a breach of the peace as a violation of public order; an act of public indecorum. In People v. Johnson, 86 Mich. 175, 18 L. R. A. 163, a breach of the peace was defined as a violation of public order, a disturbance of the public tranquillity, by any act or conduct inciting to violence, or tending to provoke or excite others to break the peace; and it was held that to be intoxicated and yelling on the public streets, in such a manner as to disturb the good order and tranquillity of the village, is an act of open violence and a breach of the peace, which, if committed in the presence of an officer, will justify an arrest without warrant. In Davis v. Burgess, 54 Mich. 514, 53 Am. Rep. 828, held, that the use of grossly indecent and profane language towards another upon the public street, and in the presence of others, is a breach of the peace. In White v. Kent, 11 Ohio St. 550, the ordinance prohibited sales at auction in the public streets. The court held that the care, supervision, and control of the streets was committed to the municipality; that it was the duty of the city to secure to the public the unobstructed use of the streets, and thus promote the order, comfort, and convenience of the inhabitants, and that whatever unnecessarily and unreasonably interfered with the primary and appropriate use of the street was a nuisance. The cases of Jones v. Root, 6 Gray, 485, and Mason v. Lothrop, 7 Gray, 854, involve the precise question which was disposed of by this court in Robison v. Miner, supra. Roberts v. State, 14 Mo. 138, 58 Am. Dec. 97, was an arrest for vagrancy, as defined by a municipal ordinance. But that case is clearly opposed to Way's Case, 41 Mich. 299. In that case, vagrancy was distinguished from disorderly conduct and breaches of the peace, and it was held that its statutory definition could not be enlarged by municipal ordinance.

And, with respect to the main question, Mr Justice Campbell says: "It must not be forgotten that there can be no arrest without due process of law. An arrest without warrant has never been lawful, except in those cases where the public security requires it; and this has only been recognized in felony, and in breaches of the peace committed in presence of the officer. Quinn v. Heisel, 40 Mich. 576; Drennan v. People, 10 Mich. 169. It could not have been contemplated—inasmuch as we are bound to suppose the legislature intended to respect constitutional safeguards—that the station-house sessions would have occasion to deal with many cases of misdemeanors, nor with any when an arrest could be safely postponed. The occasions which would justify arrest without process must be very rare indeed in cases of vagrancy; and, in a city no larger than Detroit, persons charged with disorderly conduct can very generally be dealt with more legally and justly in the regular way, inasmuch as very much of it involves no immediate danger to public or private security." It seems to me that what is meant by the term "due process of law," as employed in the constitution, is not only well settled by this court, but that its signification has been arrived at by the proper recognition of a well-recognized rule of constitutional interpretation.

I. PUBLIC, OFFICIAL, AND STATUTORY MATTERS.

The claim that a statute is unconstitutional because against the spirit of government and the general principles of law and reason is denied validity in a Texas case. (Tex.) 504.

A statute is held not to violate a constitutional provision that justice shall be administered freely and without purchase because it authorizes officers to collect reasonable fees to create a fund out of which their salaries are to be paid. (Ind.) 469.

A statute allowing punitive damages in a cause of action already existing is declared to be ex post facto as well as retrospective, within the meaning of constitutional prohibitions. (Colo.) 887.

Taking gravel from private lands for necessary repairs to highways is held constitutional, although no notice is given to the owner, where he is allowed to present a claim for compensation to the county court and have it allowed, with opportunity to be heard unquestioned. (Or.) 355.

Appropriations.

A constitutional prohibition against incurring state indebtedness without first making an appropriation is held inapplicable to a contract by the legislature for current administration of state affairs. (S. Dak.) 734.

A statute creating an office and fixing a salary to be paid is held to constitute a continuing appropriation, making an annual appropriation therefor unnecessary. (Wyo.) 266.

Regulation of business.

The constitutionality of statutes relating to contracts of employment is again discussed in a case which holds an eight hour law, except for farm and domestic labor, with a requirement that for every additional hour the pay shall be double that of the hour preceding, unconstitutional. (Neb.) 703.

The right to practice Christian science on the ground that it is an act of worship or of duty, and therefore not within the statute prohibiting unauthorized practice of medicine, is denied in a case where compensation was expected for the treatment. (Neb.) 68.

The Illinois statute restricting the sale of railroad and steamboat tickets to agents having a certificate of authority is held constitutional. (Ill.) 153.

A similar statute is held constitutional in Minnesota. (Minn.) 498.

The regulation and supervision of banking business is held within the power of the legislature in a Kansas case, which did not, however, prohibit any one from engaging in that business. (Kan.) 854.

An ordinance prohibiting public laundries except in two designated blocks without a license conditioned on the consent of neighboring owners is held an unconstitutional interference with personal and property rights. (Cal.) 195.

The constitutionality of a statute authorizing railroad commissioners to fix maximum rates presents several questions decided in an Illinois case. (Ill.) 141.

A statute compelling all regular passenger trains to stop at county seats is held to be not unreasonable, nor an interference with interstate commerce or with the United States mails. (Minn.) 503.

A horse railway is held not to be a railroad within the Tennessee act as to stopping railroad trains before crossing another railroad. (O. C. App. 6th C.) 693.

Jurisdiction.

The jurisdiction of a state court to punish manslaughter committed in the state is upheld in a New York case, although the same act was an offense under federal laws, punishable in a United States court. (N. Y.) 117.

An important discussion of the jurisdiction of decedent's estates is found in a case respecting Alabama claims, in which it is held among other things that such a claim is property in the District of Columbia for the purpose of administration there. (Vt.) 684.

See also infra, IV.

Officers.

The right of a de jure officer to recover from a de facto officer the fees or salary received by the latter is decided to be a common-law right, which is recognized in Illinois. (Ill.) 59.

An important case as to the power of the legislature to establish an additional qualification of officers such as the ownership of a freehold estate, upholds the power. (W. Va.) 343.

That a citizen may be compelled to accept an office is decided in an Illinois case, in which mundamus is upheld. (Ill.) 492.

Forbidding the removal of officers for political reasons, in a charter authorizing the governor to make such removals for cause to be stated in writing, is held to constitute a restraint only by operation on the conscience of the executive, and to give the courts no power to review his action on the ground that a removal is for political reasons, contrary to his written declaration. (Colo.) 201.

Directors of the poor are held in a Pennsylvania case to be indictable at common law for negligence in allowing the ill-treatment of a pauper boy apprenticed to an unfit master. (Pa.) 552.

Attorneys.

In a remarkably full review of the authorities on the subject of the nature of the vocation of an attorney in respect to the exercise of a public office, the New Hampshire court concludes that women may practice law, although excluded from voting or holding office. (N. H.) 740.

Municipal corporations.

The liability of a municipal corporation for failure to supply water to a private person according to contract with him is upheld in a Massachusetts case. (Mass.) 287.

The rule that a city is not liable for negligence in respect to a public duty is applied in respect to the breaking of a pole used for wires of a fire signal system of the city, whereby a lineman working for the city is injured. (Mass.) 426.

The liability of a city for damages caused by fireworks is denied in an Arizona case, distinguishing the New York case in 21 L. R. A. 641. (Ariz.) 430.

A city is held not liable for the death of a person caused by a mob, under a statute making a city liable for destruction of property by such a mob. (C. C. E. D. La.) 592.

The restriction of municipal indebtedness is involved in a case which holds that securities of the city paid by it and placed in its sinking fund are not to be counted as part of its indebtedness. (Pa.) 781.

The right to include rural land in a municipal corporation against the owner's consent is a question on which there has been some difference of opinion, but which the supreme court of Washington upholds. (Wash.) 795.

The interesting question as to the power of city authorities over trees in streets is decided in North Carolina in favor of the city and against a review of the discretion of city authorities by the courts. (N. C.) 671.

An ordinance prohibiting the use of blinds, screens, stained glass, or anything to obstruct the view of the interior of a saloon is held unreasonable and invalid, under the general power to license and regulate saloons. (Ind.) 768.

The claim that a license fee of $2,000 for the sale of liquors is prohibitory was denied on the 24 L. R. A.

facts shown, in a city of 4,000 inhabitants (Ala.) 774.

Highways.

An extensive discussion of the property rights of abutters in respect to access to their property from a highway, and to light and air, is found in a Utah case which holds that the modern doctrine makes no distinction between cases in which the fee is owned by the abutters and those in which it is held by the city in trust for the public. (Utah) 610.

The right of an abutting owner, whose access to his property from the street is practically cut off by a structure in the street, to recover for damages sustained, which is a question presenting much conflict, is decided in the affirmative in Colorado, although the constitutional provision in that state requiring compensation for property damaged is limited by the courts to extraordinary uses. (Colo.) 392.

On the other hand in Maryland a similar structure is held not to constitute a taking of any property of an abutting owner, although he is given by the statute a right of action for damages for the consequential injuries. (Md.) 396.

Although the Missouri courts have held that a city could allow a railroad in a street without compensation to abutting owners, this doctrine is denied extension to give a practical monopoly of a street to a railroad. (Mo.) 516.

The erection of telegraph poles in a highway is held in Michigan a proper street use which does not constitute an additional servitude upon the fee. (Mich.) 721.

Tanks in a street for sprinkling erected under license from a city are held not to constitute a nuisance and not to be removable without compensation to the owner. (Or.) 787.

An ordinance imposing a tax of $2 on each telegraph pole in a city for use of streets is upheld, although the telegraph company is a post-road under act of congress. (Md.) 161.

Public alley.

An ordinance closing a public alley for private use is held an illegal destruction of the easement of abutting owners. (Md.) 403.

An abutting owner's rights in an abutting alley are also protected against an over-head structure or bridge between his property and the entrance, by which his light and air are obstructed. (Ill.) 406.

Assessment for improvements.

Street sprinkling is held in an Illinois case not to constitute a public improvement, the expense of which can be charged on abutting property. (Ill.) 412.

Markets.

Market restrictions are held valid against a claim that they are unconstitutional in a Louisiana case. (La.) 584.

Normal school.

The removal of a teacher in a normal school at the pleasure of the board of regents is held not reviewable under the Wisconsin statutes, and it is also held that this power of removal is one which the board cannot waive or surrender by contract. (Wis.) 836.

II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

The tendency of courts to construe a contract with an implied condition, when that is necessary to justice, is illustrated by a decision that a guaranty of dividends of a corporation implied its continued existence. (N. Y.) 118.

The contract for services is reluctantly held, following the weight of authority, to be not subject to apportionment so as to allow any recovery for part performance by one who has broken his contract. (Miss.) 281.

That a bank passbook is not a contract which excludes oral evidence is decided in a Kansas case, citing authorities. (Kan.) 737.

The negotiability of certificates of deposit is considered in a case which holds a certificate negotiable against several different objections. (Neb.) 444.

Option.

Under a writing giving one an agency to sell land and also an option on it, his transfer of the writing to a third person is held not to make a sale or give the transferee any right without accepting the option within a reasonable time. (W. Va.) 339.

Statute of frauds.

Several interesting questions as to the effect of possession and part performance under a parol contract for lands, are decided in a Nebraska case relating to a unilateral agreement for the sale of land to a tenant, and want of mutuality is no defense to the enforcement of the contract. (Neb.) 255.

Carriers.

The relation of passenger is held not to be established in case of one having a ticket who is struck while running from a street across railroad premises to catch a train. (Mass.) 521.

The right to ride on the platform of a car is held to exist in case of a passenger with an excursion ticket, who, on the return trip, cannot get inside the car and is not informed that he can go on another train. (Cal.) 710.

Definiteness.

Indefiniteness is held fatal to a contract for the sale of portions of the bed of a street "at the market price." (Md.) 168.

Another indefinite contract was for mining ore "as long as we can make it pay." This was held insufficient to allow prospective profits on terminating the contract. (Mich.) 357.

Validity.

Public policy which will defeat a contract is considered in an Indiana case holding void a contract by a justice of the peace to arrest a person charged before him with larceny, where the compensation was dependent in amount on the recovery of property from the criminal. (Ind.) 206.

The validity of contracts stipulating against liability for negligence is a question raised in an Iowa case, respecting a provision as to the negligent destruction of buildings on the railroad right of way. (Iowa) 647.

An association of brewers to prevent competition is held illegal, although its operation was limited to the county of Philadelphia, Pa., and that of Camden, N. J. (Pa.) 247.

The anti-trust law of congress is very extensively discussed in a case which holds that the incidental restriction of competition is not necessarily a violation of the act, and that an association of railroad companies, which leaves them competitors of each other, but binds them to the rates fixed, except on ten days' notice to the contrary, is not unlawful. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 73.

The validity of an agreement between brothers and sisters holding land in common to own it as joint tenants until the death of the last survivor, when it should by descent or devise pass to the child of one of them who is then in being is upheld against the claim of unlawful suspension of alienation. Sufficient part performance to take the agreement out of the statute of frauds is shown by keeping the agreement until the last survivor has obtained the land and has received all the benefits thereof. (N. Y.) 123.

Interest

The legal rate of interest which begins to run by force of statute on a county warrant after an indorsement by the treasurer is held to constitute a part of the contract and to be not subject to change by a subsequent change in the legal rate of interest. (Wash.) 359.

Usury.

The distinction between usury which makes the debt void and those which do not is raised in a case which holds that a statute providing for a forfeiture of the entire interest avoids a note given solely for usury even in the hands of a bona fide holder. (N. C.) 280.

Appeal bond.

Denying the doctrine of the Missouri supreme court in 19 L. R. A. 182, it is held in Texas that an appeal bond remains effective on a transfer by statute of the jurisdiction of the appellate court to another court, and that such change does not impair the obligation of the contract. (Tex.) 642.

Warranty.

The warranty of a horse to be sound and kind is held not to extend to a warranty that he will not be frightened at a trolley car. (N. J.) 575.

III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.

The powers of a national bank are held, following a decision of the United States Supreme Court, to extend to a guaratee of commercial paper sold by it. (Neb.) 263.

The power of the president of a bank to employ counsel and manage its litigation is upheld in a Kansas case, in the absence of any order of the board of directors to the contrary. (Kan.) 719.

The provisions of the New York banking law applicable to savings and loan societies are construed to authorize advances, payment of dues, and the issue of prepaid and income stock with limited cash dividends. (N. Y.) 57.

(DOMESTIC RELATIONS; PERSONAL CAPACITY—TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES; NUISANCES)

Liability on a subscription to stock is considered in a case in which the subscription was for stock in a corporation to be organized, and it is held that the subscription contemplates a de jure corporation. (Neb.) 259.

Mandamus to compel the repair of a railroad track partly torn up is refused in a case where the road had been abandoned and could not be operated except at great loss, while no attempt was made to compel its operation. (Kan.) 564.

An association in which the members insure each other against loss by fire and agree to be assessed for losses is not authorized under the Ohio statutes to do business on the joint-stock plan, or the contingent-liability plan, and cannot receive nonresidents as members. (Ohio) 252.

The migration of a corporation was alleged as a ground of forfeiture in an Illinois case but was not established. (Ill.) 462.

The right of a foreign corporation to bring a suit is expressly decided in a South Carolina case, and the failure of the complaint to allege its charter power is held not fatal. (S. C.) 289.

The free, broad, and liberal policy of the state of New York toward foreign corporations is fully developed by a decision which declares that such corporations may do anything that a nonresident natural person may do, including the purchase and sale of real property in the state. (N. Y.) 822.

The validity of contracts by unauthorized foreign corporations, on which there is conflict of decisions, is upheld in Colorado and Washington. (Colo.) (Wash.) 811, 315.

An unincorporated association of another state known as a guaranty and accident Lloyds is held in Ohio to be acting as a corporation and subject to ouster under provisions excluding foreign corporations. (Ohio) 298.

The statutes giving special privileges as to interest to building and loan associations is held in an Alabama case not to extend to foreign corporations. (Ala.) 174.

An attempt to invoke the jurisdiction of a court to dissolve a foreign corporation was unsuccessful in a federal case respecting an English corporation. The court denied the power, unless expressly conferred by statute. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 776.

A foreign corporation is held not to be included in the provisions of the New York statute against assignments by insolvent corporations, and preferences by a foreign corporation are therefore held legal. (N. Y.) 548.

The power of a general conference of a church to change the constitution and confession of faith is extensively discussed in a Michigan case which holds a new constitution of the church of the United Brethren in Christ to be invalid contrary to the decisions in Indiana and Pennsylvania, but in harmony with the decision of the supreme court of Oregon and of the United States circuit court of Ohio. (Mich.) 615.

IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS; PERSONAL CAPACITY.

The jurisdiction of a suit for alimony by a wife domiciled in the state is held unaffected by a provision requiring two years residence before a suit for divorce. (Fla.) 187.

And a suit as to jurisdictional effect of residence does not defeat the power to give temporary alimony. Id.

The power of the court to punish as a contempt the refusal to pay installments of alimony is upheld in Wisconsin on the ground that an execution could not be issued to enforce collection, and inability to pay, which is brought about by the defendant himself, is held insufficient to purge him of the contempt. (Wis.) 433.

The competency of a married woman to charge herself for legal services in attempting to secure a divorce, when the suit is discontinued, is upheld in Michigan. (Mich.) 629.

The effect of statutory prohibition against remarriage of a person for whose guilt a divorce is granted is held not extraterritorial, and such statute is held not to apply to a marriage of nonresidents, from one of whom a divorce had been obtained in another state. (La.) 831.

Insanity.

The presumption of insanity from the fact of suicide is presented in a case which denies the presumption, at least so far as to affect a will made six weeks before. (La.) 577.

V. FIDUCIARIES AND REPRESENTATIVES.

The constructive notice of an attorney arising from the knowledge of his partner is presented in an interesting case which holds that such notice does not extend to transactions for her clients after dissolution of the firm. (Cal.) 197.

See also Receivers, under VIII.

VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES; NUISANCES.

Trover.

A demand by a constable by virtue of a chattel mortgage after condition broken is not such that a carrier will be liable for conversion if it refuses to surrender them. (S. C.) 100.

Selling dangerous thing.

The liability of one who sells an article known to be dangerous is considered in the novel case of alleged liability on the part of the seller of a horse having glanders for the death of a person who contracted the disease from the horse. The court regarded the complaint as insufficient in failing to allege that the disease was one which would be contracted as the natural and probable consequence of contact with the horse, but considered the li-bility to exist under a statute relating to death by wrongful act if the disease was of that character. (Md.) 679.

Blasting.

A very important case,—especially in any cities where rock must be blasted for foundations and where high buildings exist,—as to the lawfulness of blasting, by which adjoining buildings are injured through concussion merely, is decided in New York to the effect that such injury creates no liability, in the absence of negligence, if the blasting was the only proper mode of doing the work. (N. Y.) 105.

Liability of charity.

The law as to exemption of charitable institutions from liability for wrongful acts of agents is illustrated in an Iowa case, which applies it to a state agricultural society. (Iowa) 655.

Act of contractor.

The liability for the acts of an independent contractor is discussed in a case which holds that one who employs an independent contractor to excavate is not liable for his trespass to shore up an adjoining building when his contract requires him to do so "as required by law" (N. Y.) 103.

Master's liability.

A somewhat peculiar case of injury by the negligence of a baggageman in throwing from a train certain iron drills, which were carried merely by way of accommodation, holds that the carrier is not liable. (Mo.) 863.

The fact that a janitor and ticket taker at a theater is also a special policeman is held not to relieve his employers from liability for an assault made by him on a person who has engaged in a dispute with the ticket seller in respect to his change. (Ind.) 483.

Railroad cases.

Liability of a railroad company for running over a person walking on its track in plain sight of the engineer is denied in a West Virginia case. (W. Va.) 226.

The doctrine as to duty to trespassers or mere licensee is applied to a person standing on land of a railroad company merely to witness the catch of a mail pouch by a passing train and he is held to assume all the risks. (W. Va.) 215.

Contributory negligence.

The effect of contributory negligence to defeat a recovery, with discussion of the proximate cause, with other questions, is presented in a West Virginia case of injury to a passenger. (W. Va.) 50.

Orders are held sufficient to prevent the defense of contributory negligence by an employé except in extreme cases (Va.) 717.

A person struck by tools thrown from another person by a collision with a railroad train is held entitled to recover from the railroad company, although the other person was guilty of negligence in getting in the way of the train, if the railroad company was also negligent in failing to give signals and this fact co-operated in producing the injury. (N. J.) 531.

The effect of a statute providing that it shall be necessary to prove only neglect or refusal to comply with it in order to recover damages for resulting injuries is held not to bar a defense of contributory negligence, although it shifts the burden of proof. (Iowa) 657.

Pollution of stream.

The pollution of a stream by washing ore is held actionable on a review of several important and somewhat contradictory cases, where the pollution might have been avoided. (Ala.) 64.

Nuisance.

The law of nuisance caused by lawful business has an illustration in a case in which an injunction is granted against allowing filth from a creamery to flow to adjoining premises by percolation or otherwise. (Wis.) 888.

A nuisance to the public by congregation of solicitors of business in front of a railroad station is held not to be a nuisance as to the railroad company. (Ill.) 156.

VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS; LIENS; GIFTS.

Vested right.

No vested right is held to exist in a privilege given to a certain class of persons to acquire tide lands, but subsequent statutes may take it away. (Wash.) 606.

Covenant.

The necessity of an estate in the grantor to make his covenants attach to the land is an interesting question not decided in a recent New York case, which holds that mere possession of the grantor, who joins with his wife in a deed of land of which she had color of title, is sufficient,—especially where he received part of the purchase money and expressly extended his covenant to the heirs and assigns of the grantee (N. Y.) 850.

Acceptance of deed of trust.

The question whether or not a deed of trust or mortgage will take effect before acceptance by the creditor is presented in an extreme case, which decides that it does not take effect as against an attachment levy after the trustee 24 L. R. A.

had accepted the trust and taken possession of the property, or before the creditors whose claims were secured thereby had knowledge of the deed. (Tex.) 869.

Shelley's Case.

The rule in Shelley's Case is held in Indiana, overruling an earlier decision, not to apply to a deed giving a life estate with remainder to the issue of the body of the life tenant. (Ind.) 489.

Descent.

Descent through alien ancestors to collateral relatives, such as cousins, is allowed in Connecticut, where the common-law rule of exclusion of those tracing descent through uninheritable blood was never in force. (Conn.) 667.

Reversion.

The abandonment and prohibition of the use of land for burial purposes, when held by a municipal corporation under a grant for those purposes only, is held to cause a reversion to the grantor, but immediately to set the statute of limitations in force against the reversioner in favor of persons in possession. (N. J.) 843.

Courtesy.

The effect of a divorce is held in a Rhode Island case to destroy an inchoate right of courtesy, unless preserved by statute. (R. I.) 798.

Insurance.

A widow is held entitled to share in the proceeds of insurance payable to "heirs at law," where by statute she is a distributee. (Conn.) 664.

Minerals in street.

A right to minerals under the surface of a street reserved in a deed of the street is held not to be an appurtenance to the abutting lots or to pass with them, under the rule that lots bounded on the street extend to the center. (Mo.) 507.

Stock dividends.

The question whether stock dividends constitute capital or income is presented in a somewhat unusual case, where long overdue dividends on preferred stock were compromised by the issue of increased stock, and it is held that these belong to the remainderman and not to the life tenant. (Conn.) 536.

Adverse possession.

Dispossession under a judgment in ejectment, which is afterwards reversed and the possession restored, is held to interrupt an adverse possession. (Fla.) 130.

Artesian wells.

Allowing waters from an artesian well in which patients of a sanitarium have been bathed to flow into a stream which forms the natural outlet for the discharge of such waters is held not to constitute a wrong to lower proprietors, if due care is taken to prevent injury. (Ind.) 563.

Name on records.

The effect of a mistake in the initial of a middle name upon notice by records is discussed in a case which holds it immaterial, if there is nothing to show that there is more than one person of the name. (Ark.) 543.

Trees.

The right of a telegraph company to cut trees or branches of trees in a highway which belongs to an abutting owner is denied in Ohio. (Ohio) 724.

Emblements.

The right of the owner of land which is sold on execution to enjoy the use of it until final confirmation of the sale is illustrated by a decision holding that grass severed before confirmation does not pass to the purchaser. (Neb.) 449.

Mortgage notes.

The priority of notes secured by a mortgage according to their respective dates of maturity, in a state where such priority is allowed, is not affected by the fact that all the notes are made due by default in payment of the first note. (Ind.) 800.

Liens.

The effect of a statute giving a lien on personal property of a tenant for rent, under a constitutional exemption of the debtor's property, is considered in a case which upholds the exemption and denies that mere entering into the lease is a waiver thereof. (Fla.) 812.

Charity.

The uncertainty which will defeat a charitable gift is held not to exist in case of a gift for the benefit of poor churches of a city and vicinity. (Mass.) 153.

VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES; RULES AND PRINCIPLES.

Preference to creditor.

The right to prefer creditors when no general assignment is made is upheld in a South Dakota case overruling prior authority, where the statute denies preference in such general assignment. (S. Dak.) 524.

Homestead.

A judgment for a tort is regarded as a "debt contracted" within a constitutional exemption of homestead. (Mich.) 789.

Unauthorized appearance.

The proper remedy in case of a judgment rendered on an unauthorized appearance after jurisdiction of the person of the defendant had been obtained is held to be the opening of the judgment for trial on the merits and not by collateral attack, seeking an injunction and a decree that it is a nullity. (Ind.) 46.

Trust deed.

A change in the statute as to the remedy for enforcing a trust deed is held inapplicable to a prior trust deed which expressly provided the remedy. (Tex.) 284.

Fraud.

Purchasers of goods from one who fraudulently obtained them are held in a federal case chargeable by the circumstances with knowledge of his fraud, and the original seller of the goods was allowed to recover them. (C. C. App. 7th C.) 417.

Specific performance.

The right to specific performance of a contract to purchase lands from one whose wife did not sign the contract and refuses to sign the deed, is denied with a refusal to compel the husband to convey with a deduction of the value of the wife's dower interest. (D. C.) 763.

Estoppel.

The claim that the plaintiff in an action on a life policy is estopped to deny that death was caused by suicide, when proofs of loss had been made to that effect, was made in a Louisiana case, but denied by the court. (La.) 569.

Discovery.

Bills for discovery are held to be abolished in the Texas practice combining law and equity and providing for interrogatories in pending suits, and also for the deposition of adverse parties. (Tex.) 183.

For the escape of a federal prisoner. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 170.

Newspaper notice.

A legal newspaper containing some matters of interest to the general public is held to be a "newspaper" within the Michigan statute as to publication of legal notices. (Mich.) 793.

Receivers.

The exercise of comity in respect to foreign receivers is illustrated in a case which denies a claim of such a receiver to funds in the hands of a domestic receiver of local branches of the iron ball. (Conn.) 815.

The receivership of a railroad extending across a state boundary is properly extended over a small portion of the road in one of the states, where a receiver has been appointed for the greater part of the road in another state. (Ga.) 730.

Jury.

The unanimity of a jury is required by a constitutional provision for a jury of twelve to ascertain damages in an eminent domain case. (Fla.) 272.

The constitutional right of trial by jury is held not violated by a territorial statute allowing a verdict by three fourths of the jury in a civil case. (Utah) 277.

The right to trial by jury on an information in the nature of quo warranto presenting issues of fact is held to exist at common law. (Fla.) 806.

Evidence.

The law as to opinions of witnesses in respect to matters difficult to describe is illustrated by the decision allowing an opinion as to personal appearance and apparent health. (Cal.) 715.

See also Evidence in IX.

IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

That intoxication is not an excuse for crime but may be important in determining the degree of homicide is decided in a Kansas case, which repudiates the doctrine of uncontrollable impulse. (Kan.) 555.

Arrest.

A statute authorizing an arrest without warrant for an offense committed in presence of an officer is held not unconstitutional as a deprivation of due process of law, although it is applied to cases in which such an arrest was not authorized at the time when the constitution was adopted. (Mich.) 859.

Anti-trust law.

The act of congress against unlawful restraint on commerce is held inapplicable to a combination for the control of manufacturing and selling sugar in the United States. (C. C. App. 3d C.) 428.

Prize fight.

The question whether or not a glove contest is what is commonly known as a prize fight is considered in a Louisiana case, in which it is held that a contest with five-ounce gloves, under the Marquis of Queensbury rules, is not a prize fight. (La.) 452.

Intoxicating liquors.

The contention that a purchaser of intoxicating liquors illegally sold is a participant in the crime, subject to punishment, is made in a Kansas case, but not upheld. (Kan.) 212.

The arrival of intoxicating liquors within the state under the Wilson bill is held to mean the crossing of the state line, although the transportation is not complete. (Iowa) 245.

The Iowa law against transporting intoxicating liquors without a certificate that the consignee has a right to sell them is held applicable to a mere removal from the platform to a freight room of a depot. (Iowa) 245.

Forgery.

The invalidity of a writing if genuine is held not to prevent it from being the subject of forgery when it might injure another if genuine. (Cal.) 33.

Obscenity.

The question what constitutes obscene literature is answered in a New York case, excluding from the charge of obscenity a list of standard works. (N. Y.) 110.

Evidence.

A case of unusual importance in respect to evidence is one which holds evidence of declarations of a person admissible to show intent, although they did not constitute part of the res gestae. (Mass.) 235.

A somewhat extreme instance of the youth of a witness is that of a Wisconsin case in which the witness was a child five years and five months old at the time of the trial, and but four years and nine months old at the time of the transaction in question. (Wis.) 857.

An untutored deaf mute is held competent to testify by signs through an interpreter, although the latter is not an expert. (S. C.) 126.

GENERAL INDEX

TO

OPINIONS, NOTES AND BRIEFS.

(Separate Index to Notes precedes this.)

ACTION OR SUIT.

1. The United States may sue as the party aggrieved, upon the bond of a sheriff from whom a federal prisoner lawfully in his custody has escaped, where the state statute authorizes suit on the bond by any party aggrieved. State, United States, v. Hill (C. C. App. 6th C.) 170

2. An entire contract for services cannot be apportioned so as to permit a recovery for part performance by one who is guilty of a breach of the contract. Timberlake v. Thayer (Mass.) 231

3. An agreement by brothers and sisters to whom land has descended in common, to hold the same as joint tenants, and that it shall pass to the survivor and from the latter by descent or devise to a child of one of the brothers, is enforceable by such child, although he was not a party thereto. Murphy v. Whitney (N. Y.) 123

4. Acts of a railroad or other private corporation in the execution of charter or statutory powers are not within the rule that legislative authority for acts causing consequential injury to private property is a bar to a claim for indemnity. Booth v. Rome, W. & O. T. R. Co. (N. Y.) 105

5. A defense to a guaranty of corporate dividends, that the corporation has been dissolved, cannot be defeated on the ground that the dissolution was caused by defendant's own misconduct, where it was adjudged on the application of the plaintiff for technical breaches of corporate duty, for some of which he was as much responsible as the defendant. Lorillard v. Clyde (N. Y.) 118

6. An ejectment suit may be revived in the name of the heirs on the death of the plaintiff, although the provision in McClell. (Fla.) Dig. p. 829, § 74, is for revival in the name of the "legal representative," since the heir is the real representative of the ancestor, and by the Supreme Court Rule 95 any person in interest, other than the executor and administrator, may be made a party by direction of the court. Gould v. Carr (Fla.) 180

ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. Adverse possession begins against the reversioner immediately upon a reversion of title by abandonment and prohibition of the use for which alone the land was granted, whether the legal title has passed to the reversioner or still remains in a trustee discharged of the public use. Newark v. Watson (N. J. Err. & App.) 843

2. The continuity of adverse possession is interrupted by dispossession under a judgment in ejectment, although this is reversed on appeal and the possession restored. Gould v. Carr (Fla.) 180

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Adverse possession; continuity of. 181

AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY. See CHARITIES, 8; MASTER AND SERVANT, 9.

ALIMONY. See CONTEMPT, HUSBAND AND WIFE, 2, 3, NOTES AND BRIEFS.

ALLEY.

1. Special damages are caused to an abutting owner by an overhead bridge across a public alley or street, when the light and air passing to his property over such alley will be seriously diminished by the structure. Field v. Barling (Ill.) 406

2. The right of an abutting owner who has bought with reference to a dedicated public alley or street, to have it forever kept open, includes the enjoyment of light and air from the space above extending unobstructed to the sky. Id.

3. The right to make a bridge or overhead crossing over a public alley for private use cannot be granted by city authorities, although the fee of the alley belongs to the city. Id.

4. The easement of an abutting owner in a public alley laid out by the original grantor of the land, who conveyed it with reference to the alley as a boundary, cannot be taken away for private use by an ordinance closing the alley. Van Witsen v. Gutman (Md.) 408

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Alleys; closing up as injury to abutting owner. 403

Building bridge over as injury to abutting owner. 406

ANIMALS.

The willful and malicious killing of a dog is not an indictable offense under Ga. Code, § 4627, as the "injuring or destroying . . . public or private property," even if dogs are regarded as property, since this statutory provision is intended to apply exclusively to inanimate property. Faiton v. State (Ga.) 732

ANTI-TRUST LAW. See CONSPIRACY, NOTES AND BRIEFS; STATUTES, 10.

APPEAL AND ERROR.

1. An allegation by an appellant that he is "aggrieved both as an heir at law and next of kin" is a mere averment of a legal conclusion, and not sufficient to show a right to appeal, where the facts set up show that his claim is without foundation. Campbell's Appeal (Conn.) 687

2. An assignment of error embracing three distinct propositions, without particularly specifying the error complained of, is insufficient. Union C. L. Ins. Co. v. Chouning (Tex.) 504

3. Refusal to permit defendant's counsel to ask a juror on his voir dire to what extent he had read about the case in the newspapers, after the statutory questions had been exhausted, is not an abuse of discretion requiring reversal, if there is nothing to show what counsel had any reasonable expectation of proving. Com. v. Trejethen (Mass.) 235

4. The vacation of a judgment by default at the term during which it was rendered will not be reversed unless there is a clear abuse of discretion; and a stronger showing of abuse must be made than in cases where a trial on the merits is denied. Bigler v. Baker (Neb.) 255

5. The relieving of a plaintiff from a stipulation submitting the case on a motion for nonsuit, and allowing him to file an amended complaint, is discretionary, and not reviewable on appeal. Robinson v. Exempt Fire Co. (Cal.) 715

6. An objection to evidence is not available on appeal unless saved by bill of exceptions, although noted on certificate of evidence. Poling v. Ohio River R. Co. (W. Va.) 215

7. An express statement that the report and verdict are concurred in by ten of the jurors defeats any presumption that all of the jurors concurred, as required by law, although all signed the report. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Adams (Fla.) 272

8. The answer to particular questions of fact is waived by allowing the jury to find a general verdict without asking the court to have them answered. Carrico v. West Virginia C. & P. R. Co. (W. Va.) 50

9. One who directed an arrest and is found guilty of false imprisonment cannot complain that the one who actually made the arrest was found not guilty. Burroughs v. Eastman (Mich.) 859

10. Direct evidence of suicide is not necessary to require the consideration of the correctness of the exclusion of evidence of intention 24 L. R. A.

to commit it, since that theory must be considered by the jury if the circumstances of the case afford evidence to support it. Com. v. Trejethen (Mass.) 235

11. A motion to direct a verdict for the defendant is waived when he proceeds with his evidence. Poling v. Ohio River R. Co. (W. Va.) 215

12. One whose demurrer has been sustained cannot, for the purpose of sustaining the judgment, challenge the truthfulness of the statements in the pleadings demurred to. Barnard v. Shirley (Ind.) 568

13. Findings of fact in a chancery case are conclusive in the appellate court, unless they are so manifestly erroneous as to demonstrate some oversight or mistake. Block v. Salt Lake Rapid Transit Co. (Utah) 610

14. A general finding by a referee that a party was duly appointed administrator of the estate of a person referred to as "deceased" throughout the report is sufficient to sustain the administration, where nothing further appears in the record to enable the appellate court to judge of its legality. Manning v. Leighton (Vt.) 684

15. An instruction assuming as true facts proved beyond controversy is not ground for reversal because of such assumption. Carrico v. West Virginia C. & P. R. Co. (W. Va.) 50

16. It is not prejudicial error to admit against one on trial for murder the whole of a conversation in which some of his replies had a tendency to show guilt, while others were explicit denials of guilt. Com. v. Trejethen (Mass.) 235

17. Failure to pass upon a demurrer to a defense, and entering judgment for plaintiff on the pleadings, is not prejudicial to defendant when the defense was insufficient and the defect such that it could not have been cured by amendment. Kindel v. Beck & P. Lithographing Co. (Colo.) 311

18. A statute forbidding reversal of a judgment when it shall appear that the merits of the case have been fairly tried and determined cannot be applied in case of the erroneous sustaining of a demurrer to the affirmative matter in a paragraph of the answer, when the effect was to exclude evidence of the matters therein alleged, so that it is impossible to determine from the record how far defendant was prejudiced by the ruling. Barnard v. Shirley (Ind.) 568

19. An appellant cannot insist on having clerical errors in the judgment corrected by the appellate rather than by the trial court, although the correction by the trial court deprives him of his ground for appeal. Kindel v. Beck & P. Lithographing Co. (Colo.) 311

20. The trial court may correct a clerical error in the amount of the judgment entered, after the record has been removed to a higher court by appeal. Id.

21. An appeal bond executed in accordance with the law in force at the time does not become inoperative by a transfer of the appellate jurisdiction to a different court. Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Mussette (Tex.) 642

APPRENTICE.

Directors of the poor who apprentice a pauper boy, with knowledge of the unfit character of the master, and who, with knowledge that the child is being abused by such master, refuse to take any measures to rescue him from the cruelty to which he is subjected, are criminally liable at common law as for a willful neglect or refusal to discharge their duties. Com. v. Coyle (Pa.) 552

APPROPRIATIONS.

A continuing appropriation of the amount of the salary, which omission of annual appropriation will not affect, is made by a statute creating an office and fixing the salary in obedience to a constitutional mandate, and requiring it to be paid by the treasurer in the same manner as other salaries of state officers are paid, where the constitution provides that an officer's salary shall not be diminished during his term, although it also provides that no money shall be paid out of the treasury except on appropriations made by the legislature. State, Henderson, v. Burdick (Wyo.) 266

ARREST. See also CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 18.

1. Constitutional provisions against issuing a warrant without probable cause supported by oath or affirmation do not apply to an arrest without a warrant. Burroughs v. Eastman (Mich.) 859

2. An arrest without warrant may be authorized by the legislature for other misdemeanors committed in the presence of an officer, as well as for breach of the peace. Id.

ATTACHMENT. See MORTGAGE, 1.

ATTORNEYS. See also EXECUTORS and ADMINISTRATORS, 5; JUDGMENT, 8; NOTICE, 2, 8.

1. An attorney at law is not an officer of the government, such that the right of admission to the bar will depend on eligibility to public office. Re Ricker (N. H.) 740

2. Women are not excluded from admission as attorneys at law by the common-law rule which denies them the right to vote or hold public office. Id.

3. The provisions of the Act of Congress of June 5, 1882, re-establishing the Court of Alabama Claims, and authorizing the rendition of judgments in the mode and subject to the conditions, limitations, and provisions of the Act of 1874 originally establishing such court, revive the provision that the court shall on motion allow the compensation of attorneys and enter it as part of its judgment, and that all other liens upon the judgment shall be of no effect. Manning v. Leighton (Vt.) 684

4. Claims under the Act of Congress of June 5, 1882, for damage on the high seas by Confederate cruisers and for premiums charged for war risks after the sailing of any Confederate cruiser, although to be satisfied out of a particular fund without further responsibility on the part of the United States, are, since the money had been covered into the treasury and the right to it was to be established by legal proceedings, within the provisions of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3477, making void all transfers and assignments of any claim upon the United States before the allowance of the claim and the issuing of the warrant, so as to prevent a lien in favor of an attorney under an agreement for a conditional fee for their prosecution. Id.

5. An attorney who has rendered services in the recovery of a claim from the United States, which has finally been recovered by the administrator of the beneficiary through another attorney, cannot impose a lien upon the funds, where such administrator had no further notice of the lien than the mere knowledge that such attorney had rendered services in connection with the claims; nor can he hold him personally liable although he has paid over the fund to the persons entitled. Id.

6. The right of an attorney to assert a lien upon a recovery on a claim against the United States, under an agreement for a conditional fee, is inconsistent with U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3477, providing that all transfers and assignments of any claim upon the United States, or of any interest therein, shall be absolutely null and void unless made with certain formalities and after the allowance of the claim and the issuing of a warrant therefor. Id.

7. An attorney's lien is either a retaining or a charging lien. The former is based upon the possession of money or papers, and expires when the possession ends. The latter is the right to make the claim for compensation a charge upon the judgment, and is not perfected until notice is given the defendant. Id.

ATTORNEYS' FEES.

An attorneys' fee for the foreclosure of a mortgage, expressly provided for in the instrument, is collectible on foreclosure. Falls v. United States Sav. Loan & Bldg. Co. (Ala.) 174.

AUCTIONEER. See FRAUD, 2.

BANKS.

1. Constitutional provisions authorizing the organization and control of banks of cir-ulation do not prohibit the enactment of laws imposing reasonable regulations upon banks of deposit and discount. Blaker v. Hood (Kan.) 864

2. A national bank may guarantee the payment of commercial paper as incidental to the exercise of its power to buy and sell the same. Thomas v. City Nat. Bank (Neb.) 268

3. The president of a national bank is conclusively presumed to have authority to guarantee commercial paper on a sale thereof, in the absence of notice to the contrary. Id.

4. The retention and enjoyment by a national bank of the proceeds of a guaranty of payment of commercial paper sold by its president ratifies his act. Id.

5. The president of a banking corporation has the power to employ counsel and manage the litigation of the bank, in the absence of any order of the board of directors depriving him of such power. Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Berry (Kan.) 719

6. A certificate of deposit issued by a bank and made payable to order or bearer, and payable on return of the certificate properly indorsed, is a negotiable instrument. Kirkwood v. Hastings First Nat. Bank (Neb.) 444

7. A provision for interest if left for six months, but no interest after six months, does not destroy the negotiability of a certificate of deposit. Id.

8. The provision that a certificate of deposit is payable in current funds does not prevent it from being negotiable. Id.

9. A certificate of deposit becomes overdue after the expiration of six months, and not until then, when it provides that it is not subject to check, and that it shall bear interest at 6 per cent if left six months, but no interest after six months. Id.

1. The suspension, even for a day, of a right of action on a promissory note against the maker by an arrangement with him, irrevocably discharges an indorser, although the maker may break his contract by which the right of action against him was suspended. Timberlake v. Thayer (Miss.) 281

2. A note given solely for usury is void, even in the hands of a bona fide holder, under a statute which provides that the taking of "usury" shall be deemed a forfeiture of the entire interest, but which does not avoid the debt as to the principal. Ward v. Sugg (N. C.) 280

BLASTING. See also NUISANCES, 1.

Injury to another's house by a mere concussion, without throwing rock or other material on the premises, occasioned by blasting on one's own premises in order to adapt them to a lawful use, when that mode is the only proper one and the work is transacted with due care and diligence,—creates no liability. *Booth v. #### BOUNDARIES.

The rule that a city lot bounded on a street extends to the middle of the street may be applied to carry title to minerals under the surface of the street, which had been expressly reserved on a prior conveyance of the surface of the street. Snoddy v. Bolen (Mo.) 507

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS. See also CONFLICT OF LAWS, 3.

1. The steps taken to become a member of a building and loan association must be regulated by the law of its domicile, and the fees allowed by that law will be held valid everywhere. Falls v. United States Sav. L. & Bldg. Co. (Ala.) 174

2. A statute giving special advantages to building and loan associations, as to the rate of interest they may receive on loans, will, unless a contrary intention appears, be confined in its operation to domestic corporations. Id.

3. Persons compelled to take stock in a loan association to secure a loan, but for whom the scheme of the concern provides no dividends or other share in the profits, cannot be regarded as members and their payments as made upon stock calls for the purpose of taking them out of the usury law. Id.

4. Income stock on which 60 per cent shall be paid in advance, with cash dividends limited to 8 per cent as the only profit to the stockholders, while any dividends beyond these shall go to holders of other kinds of stock, is not illegal under the New York law applicable to savings and loan societies. People, Fairchild, v. Preston (N. Y.) 57

5. Prepaid stock on which 60 per cent of the amount of the shares shall be paid in, and on which dividends at the rate of 6 per cent per annum on the amount paid in may be drawn out, with any further dividends to be credited and payable with the stock at its maturity, is not illegal under N. Y. Laws 1893, chap. 689. Id.

6. Dues may be paid in advance with the assent of the directors in a savings and loan society, under the New York banking law (N. Y. Laws 1892, chap. 689), and a rebate or discount on such payments allowed at such rate per annum as the directors from time to time prescribe. Id.

1. The right to stand and ride upon the platform of a car exists where, on the return of an excursion, a passenger with an excursion ticket is unable to get room inside the car, and is not informed that he can be carried on another train. Lynn v. Southern P. Co. (Cal.) 710

2. A railroad company which undertakes to transport all the passengers on board a train, although some are upon platforms, must exercise all additional care commensurate with the perils and dangers surrounding the passengers in such situation. Id.

3. A railroad company is liable for injury to a passenger thrown from the platform of a car on which he is lawfully riding, when the accident is due to the excessive speed of the train, considering the curves and condition of the track, which occasions a severe jar or jolt. Id.

4. A person does not become a passenger because he has previously obtained a ticket, and is on the premises of a railroad company designed for the use of passengers, and is about to take a train, where he is running from the direction of a public street, across the premises, outside the station, to catch a train about to start, and is struck while crossing a track by an incoming train. Webster v. Fitchburg R. Co. (Mass.) 521

5. The word "owner," in the Minnesota statute requiring the owner of a railroad or steamboat to redeem unused tickets, includes all those who operate a railroad or steamboat in the transportation of passengers,—as, for example, lessees, receivers, and the like. State v. Corbett (Minn.) 498

6. That an obstruction causing an accident on a railroad was the result of work done on the road by an independent contractor is no defense to the carrier. Carrico v. West Virginia O. & P. R. Co. (W. Va.) 50

CASE.

Case, and not trespass, is the proper form of action for applying a running stream to such uses as to render it impure and fill it with a sediment which is deposited on the land of a lower proprietor, thereby preventing him from putting the water to the ordinary uses, and damaging his land. *Drake v. 3. A state agricultural society, which is one of the agencies of the state, and not a corporation for pecuniary profit, cannot be held liable for the willful and illegal acts of its agents, as in case of willful arrests and assaults. A'Hern v. Iowa State Agri. Soc. (Iowa) 655

1. The regulation of the sale of tickets on railroads and steamboats, which makes such sale unlawful without a certificate of authority from the carrier, is not a regulation of commerce beyond the power of a state legislature, but is a mere police regulation of a public employment. Burdick v. People (Ill.) 152;

State v. Corbett (Minn.) 488

2. Only transportation within the state, or that which is not a part of any continuous transportation without the state, is within the provisions of Ill. Act May 2, 1873, §§ 1, 7, 8, 11; and these do not, therefore, affect interstate commerce. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Jones (Ill.) 141

3. A consignment of intoxicating liquors "arrives" in the state within the meaning of the Wilson Bill, which makes such liquors subject "upon arrival in such state" to the laws of the state, as soon as it crosses the state boundary and enters the state, although the contract of carriage is not then completed. State v. Rhodes (Iowa) 245

4. A statute compelling railroad companies to stop all regular passenger trains at county seats is not an interference with interstate commerce. State v. Hudson (Minn.) 502

1. The question of the validity of the attempted transfer of title to an assignee for creditors by a corporation organized in one state and doing business in another is for the state in which the property is situated. Van derpool v. Gorman (N.Y.) 548

2. Assignments of personal property valid by the law of the domicile of the assignor are generally recognized as valid by the law of the state where the property is situated, unless they violate its statutory law or its known and settled public policy. Id.

3. The words "heirs at law," in a benefit certificate made in Massachusetts by inhabitants of that state, must be construed in another state as they would be in Massachusetts. Mullen v. Reed (Conn.) 664

4. Charter privileges as to the rate of interest a corporation may receive on its loans are not available to it in a foreign state, in contravention of the usury laws. Falls v. United States Sav. L. & Bldg. Co. (Ala.) 174

5. The borrowing of money from the local agent of a foreign loan association which maintains a place of business within the state, and giving the association a mortgage as security through him, is a local contract, although the papers are to be approved and the money paid at the domicile of the association, and the papers expressly state that the contract is to be governed by the law of the domicile. Id.

CONSPIRACY.

1. Control of the business of refining and selling sugar in the United States does not involve a monopoly or restraint of foreign or interstate commerce, under the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, as this Act does not include the regulation of manufactures or productive industries of any sort, even if their product is a subject of commerce. United States v. E. C. Knight Co. (C. C. App. 3d C.) 428

2. A contract between competing railroad companies is not necessarily "in restraint of trade" and illegal, within the meaning of the Anti-trust Act of Congress, because it in some manner imposes a restriction upon competition. United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 73

3. An association of railroad companies cannot be held to create a monopoly, within the meaning of the Anti-trust Act of Congress, where it is not intended to have any trade of its own, but to be a mere adviser of its members, who are competitors of each other. Id.

4. An association of railroad companies for mutual protection by establishing and maintaining reasonable rates, rules, and regulations, is not illegal as a restraint of trade, under the Anti-trust Act of Congress, merely because it incidentally tends to restrict competition in some degree, where each member of the association must still compete with other members for business, and, while regular monthly meetings are provided for at which action may be taken, five days' notice of any proposed reduction of rates or change of rules must be given, and members are bound by the decision of the association unless they give written notice in ten days thereafter to the contrary, and any member may withdraw on thirty days' notice. Id.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

As to Bank, see BANKER, 1.

See also ARREST; LICENSE; MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, 1, 3.

1. A statute providing penalties for breach of contract cannot be held unconstitutional merely on the ground that it is against the genius, nature, and spirit of the government and general principles of law and reason. Union C. L. Ins. Co. v. Chouning (Tex.) 504

2. A statute allowing punitive or exemplary damages in a case in which the right thereto did not previously exist is, so far as it applies to existing causes of action, a violation of constitutional prohibitions of ex post facto laws and retrospective legislation. French v. Deane (Colo.) 387

3. There is no unconstitutional delegation of power to railroad commissioners by a statute authorizing them to fix reasonable maximum rates of charges for freight and passenger traffic, where their schedule is not final, but is made merely prima facie evidence of the reasonableness of the rates established. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Jones (Ill.) 141

4. The constitutional right to contract with reference to compensation for services is violated by a statute limiting a legal day's work to eight hours, and requiring for every hour's work in excess of that number double the pay of the preceding hour. Low v. Rees Printing Co. (Neb.) 702

5. The police power of the state to grant licenses to engage in a business does not apply to a statute allowing tickets of carriers to be sold only by agents appointed in a particular manner. State v. Corbett (Minn.) 498

6. The constitutional provision that "justice shall be administered freely and without purchase" is not violated by a statute authorizing officers to tax and collect reasonable fees for services, to create a fund out of which their salaries are to be paid. Henderson v. State, Stout (Ind.) 489

7. Requiring an insurance company to pay a penalty and attorneys' fees if compelled to pay a loss which it fails to pay within the time specified in the contract does not tend to prevent a resort to the courts, in contravention of a constitutional requirement that all courts shall be open. Union C. L. Ins. Co. v. Chowning (Tex.) 504

Equality.

8. A statute allowing the sale of carriers' tickets only by agents appointed in a particular manner, and providing for the redemption of unused tickets, is not unconstitutional as class legislation granting special privileges to carriers. State v. Corbett (Minn.) 498

9. The privileges or immunities of citizens under the Federal Constitution, or under the Constitution of Illinois, which provides that the General Assembly shall not pass special laws granting any special or exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise, are not infringed by a statute prohibiting the sale of railroad or steamboat tickets without a certificate of authority from the carrier, except when one who has bought a ticket from such agent with the bona fide intention of traveling upon it makes the sale. Burdick v. People (Ill.) 152

10. A constitutional guaranty of equal rights and privileges to all free men does not apply to corporations. Union C. L. Ins. Co. v. Chowning (Tex.) 504

11. A statute making an insurance company liable for damages and attorneys' fees in case of failure to pay a loss within the time specified in the policy does not deny such companies the equal protection of the laws. Id.

12. An exception of farm and domestic labor from a statute limiting a legal day's work to eight hours, and making the pay for every additional hour double that of the hour preceding, is unconstitutional as class legislation. Low v. Rees Printing Co. (Neb.) 702

Due process of law.

13. A law constitutionally enacted, which affords a hearing before it condemns, and provides for judgment after trial, does not deprive of property, privileges, or immunities without due course of the law of the land. Union C. L. Ins. Co. v. Chowning (Tex.) 504

14. A statute authorizing gravel to be taken from private lands for necessary repairs on highways is not unconstitutional because notice is not required to be given to the owner, or any participation allowed him in the selection or formation of the tribunal to assess his damages, where he is given an opportunity to present a claim for compensation to the county court by written complaint, and have his damages assessed and paid, with opportunity to be heard on that question. Branson v. Gee (Or.) 855

15. A statute prohibiting more than fair and reasonable rates by a railroad corporation, being merely declaratory of a common-law rule, although penal, does not deprive the company of its property without due process of law because the statute does not fix any limit to the rates,—especially where a provision is made in the same statute for the fixing of rates by commissioners. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Jones (Ill.) 141

16. A person is not deprived of his property in a carrier's ticket without due process of law by prohibiting the sale thereof,—at least where he purchased the ticket while the Act was in force. State v. Corbett (Minn.) 498

17. A statute making it unlawful for any person to sell a railroad or steamboat ticket, or any part thereof, without a certificate from the carrier, except in case of the sale of part of a ticket by a person who has bought it with the bona fide intention of traveling upon it, does not violate the constitutional provision against deprivation of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Burdick v. People (Ill.) 152

18. The constitutional requirement of due process of law is not violated by a statute extending the right to arrest without warrant for crime committed in presence of an officer, to offenses for which such arrest was not authorized when the constitution was adopted. Burroughs v. Eastman (Mich.) 859

CONTEMPT.

1. Contempt proceedings will lie to compel payment of installments of alimony ordered to be paid in the future by a final judgment of divorce, where an execution cannot be issued, since there is no provision of law for collecting such judgment. Staples v. Staples (Wis.) 483

2. Inability to pay installments of alimony, brought about by the party himself with intention to avoid payment, will not prevent his refusal to pay from being contumacious and punishable as a contempt of court. Id.

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Contempt; proceedings in, to compel payment of alimony:—(I.) doctrine of contempt; (II.) constitutionality of contempt; (III.) when contempt proceedings may be resorted to; (IV.) evidence in support of; (V.) necessity of service of order; (VI.) necessity of demand of payment; (VII.) necessity of notice of application; (VIII.) right of defendant to be heard; (IX.) excuses for nonpayment; inability to pay; (X.) commitment refused; (XI.) application for relief; (XII.) power of court to inquire into; (XIII.) state statutes and decisions thereunder; (XIV.) CONTRACTS. See also ACTION OR SUIT, 1-3; GUARANTY; INTEREST, 2.

1. In unilateral contracts called options, the time fixed for acceptance is of the essence of the contract. Dyer v. Duffy (W. Va.) 839

2. A mere proposal to sell land does not become a sale until accepted and notice of acceptance given the proposer. Id.

3. Want of mutuality is no defense, even in an action for specific performance of a unilateral contract for the sale of land, where the party not bound thereby has performed all the conditions of the contract and brought himself clearly within its terms. Bigler v. Baker (Neb.) 255

4. The deed of an agent executed in the presence and under the personal direction of his principal is not within a statute of frauds providing that an agent may subscribe a deed when authorized by writing. Id.

5. Possession of one who entered as a tenant must be clearly shown to result from the contract, and not from the lease, in order to take a verbal contract of purchase out of the Statute of Frauds. Id.

6. Lasting and valuable improvements upon premises, made by one in possession under a parol agreement of purchase, constitute sufficient part performance, notwithstanding default of payment, to defeat an action of ejectment. Id.

7. An agreement between brothers and sisters to whom land has descended in common, that the same shall be held by them as joint tenants and pass to the survivor by devise or descent, and at the death of the last survivor shall pass by devise or descent to the child of the only married one of them, is sufficiently performed to be taken out of the operation of the statute of frauds by its substantial keeping by all the parties thereto until the land has become vested in the survivor, who has received all the fruits thereof which are to come to her, and to make it enforceable by such child. Murphy v. Whitney (N. Y.) 123

Validity.

8. Equity will not aid a person in an action, if he requires the aid of an illegal transaction to establish his case. Nester v. Continental Brew. Co. (Pa.) 247

9. The provision that carriers cannot exempt themselves from liability by contract, found in Iowa Code, § 1808, does not apply to a contract as to buildings on the railroad right of way, although built for the promotion of the carrier's business. Grinbold v. Illinois C. R. Co. (Iowa) 647

10. The public has no interest in the question whether a railroad company or a lessee who erects buildings on the right of way shall bear the loss resulting from negligence of the railroad company's servants, so as to raise any question of policy in respect to a contract exempting the company from such liability. Id.

11. A stipulation against liability for damage by fire communicated by railroad trains, either accidentally or negligently, is not against public policy when made in a lease at a nominal rent of a portion of the railroad right of way for an elevator, warehouse, and other buildings for use in connection with and for the promotion of the railroad company's business; and a statute making the railroad company absolutely liable for all damages caused by negligent fires does not change this rule. Id.

12. Contracts between carriers are not necessarily invalid because they incidentally restrict competition, but this depends upon their reasonableness. United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 73

13. The true test of the illegality of a combination to restrict business is its effect upon the public interests. Nester v. Continental Brew. Co. (Pa.) 247

14. A combination of brewers to silence and stifle competition among them within the city and county of Philadelphia and the county of Camden, New Jersey, fixing a minimum price at which any of them shall sell beer to the customer of another or to new trade,—is void as against public policy. Id.

15. Imposing a penalty on the officers, agents, and stockholders of a foreign corporation for doing business in the state without filing a certificate, does not render void a contract by the corporation to manufacture articles at its domicile and deliver them to the purchaser in the state imposing the penalty. Kindel v. Beck & P. Lithographing Co. (Colo.) 311

16. A provision of a statute imposing a penalty "for every day that business is done by a foreign corporation, without registering," as required by law, does not of itself make void contracts made by such corporation while unregistered. Edison General Electric Co. v. Canadian P. Nav. Co. (Wash.) 315

17. A contract by a justice of the peace to make an arrest for a pecuniary consideration contingent on the amount of property that may be recovered of a person who is charged with larceny by an affidavit filed with such justice is void on grounds of public policy, even if the proceeding before the justice can be merely a preliminary examination. Brown v. Columbus First Nat. Bank (Ind.) 206

18. The fact that a justice of the peace has in reality no jurisdiction of the case will not prevent a contract by him to secure the arrest of a person against whom a prosecution has been instituted before him from being against public policy, where the extent of his compensation is contingent on the recovery of property from the defendant. Id.

Construction and effect.

19. A contract to mine ore in a certain pit at a certain price per ton "as long as we can make it pay" is too indefinite to entitle the contracting parties to an allowance for prospective profits in case their work is stopped by the other party to the contract. Danie v. Lumberman's Min. Co. (Mich.) 357

20. Every contract by a teacher for employment, made with the board of regents of normal schools in Wisconsin, includes as part of it the statutory provision for removal at pleasure of the board. Gillan v. Board of Regents (Wis.) 336

21. A contract to pay for the services of one expert in putting in an electrical equipment will not authorize a recovery at contract rates for the services of two. Edison General Electric Co. v. Canadian P. Nav. Co. (Wash.) 815

22. Retaining and making use of materials, and neglecting to return or offer to return them, will not authorize a recovery for their price, under a contract providing for payment when the work is "in good working order." Id.

23. That the light complies with the contract at the moment the equipment is completed will not entitle the seller to the price under a contract to furnish an electric-light equipment of certain power, which provides for payment when the work is "found to be in good working order," if a practical test within a reasonable time thereafter demonstrates that the required power has not been attained. Id.

Impairing obligation.

24. Holding an appeal bond executed as security for an appeal to the appellate court, which then had jurisdiction in such cases, to be valid after the transfer by statute of such jurisdiction to another court, does not impair the obligation of a contract, as the bond is made in view of the known power to change the jurisdiction. Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Musette (Tex.) 642

25. Obligations of sureties on appeal bonds are not contracts within the constitutional protection against impairment of obligations, as they are not based on consent of adverse litigants, but are assumed by the makers of such bonds, which are permitted, and thereby the right to appeal secured under the provisions of positive law. Id.

26. The power of railroad commissioners to make a schedule of reasonable maximum rates does not impair the obligation of the contract of a railroad company, under the Illinois act of 1863, which authorizes its board of directors to establish rates of toll from time to time, but also provides that the company's by-laws shall not be repugnant to the constitution and laws of the state. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Jones (Ill.) 141

27. The obligation of contracts is not impaired as to tickets thereafter issued, by a statute restricting the sale thereof without a certificate of authority from the carrier. Burdick v. People (Ill.) 152

28. A provision for notice of sale under a deed of trust, which is included in the contract, cannot be changed by a subsequent statute providing for different notice in all such cases. International Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Hardy (Tex.) 284

1. Failure to file the articles of incorporation, as required by statute in order to authorize a company to commence business, prevents it from becoming a corporation de jure. Capps v. Hastings Prospecting Co. (Neb.) 259

2. A de jure corporation is one whose right to exercise a corporate function would prove invulnerable if assailed by the state in quo warranto proceedings. Id.

3. An agreement to subscribe and pay for stock within thirty days from the organization of a corporation means stock of a corporation de jure, and not de facto, and therefore is not binding until the corporation is lawfully organized so as to be authorized to do business. Id.

4. Persons who are not members of an assessment fire association cannot lawfully fill the office of director thereof. State, Richards, v. Manufacturers' Mut. Fire Assn. (Ohio) 252

Control; winding-up.

5. A stockholder in a corporation cannot successfully invoke the power of a chancery court to control its officers or board of managers or to wrest the corporate property from their charge, through the agency of a receiver, so long as they neither do nor threaten to do any fraudulent or ultra vires acts, and so long as they keep within the limits of by-laws which have been prescribed for their governance. Republican Mountain Silver Mines v. Brown (C. C. App. 8th C.) 776

6. A court of equity has no power to interpose its authority for the purpose of adjusting controversies that have arisen among the shareholders or directors of a corporation relative to the proper mode of conducting the corporate business. Id.

7. Equity had at common law no power to decree a surrender or forfeiture of corporate franchises at the suit of an individual. Id.

8. Statutory provisions as to the notice to be given of a meeting to consider the question of liquidating a corporation must prevail over provisions in the by-laws. Id.

9. The motives of the stockholders of a corporation, resident at its domicile, in calling a meeting to wind it up on such short notice that the majority stockholders resident at its place of business cannot attend the meeting, will not cause equity to interfere, if the proceeding is strictly according to law and the foreign stockholders might have appointed an agent to represent their interests. Id.

10. Provisions in the by-laws, as to notice of a meeting to consolidate with another corporation, can have no application to a proceeding to liquidate the corporation and sell the assets. Id.

11. At common law an insolvent corporation can make a general assignment in trust to an assignee for the benefit of creditors. Vanderpool v. Gorman (N. Y.) 548

12. An assignment by a corporation for the benefit of creditors is a corporate act which may be performed by the president and secretary under the authority of the board of directors, in the absence of any statute or by-law providing that it shall be otherwise done. Id.

Forfeiture.

13. Nonresidence of the officers, directors, and stockholders of a domestic corporation, is not, in the absence of statutory requirements, express or implied, a ground for forfeiture of its franchises. North & S. Rolling-Stock Co. v. People, Schaefer (Ill.) 463

14. Neglect of the officers of a corporation to have its property listed for taxation is not sufficient cause for a forfeiture of its franchises. Id.

15. The mere fact that the books of a corporation have been kept most of the time in a foreign state, contrary to a statutory requirement, is not sufficient cause to forfeit its franchises, if the two places of location are but a short distance apart across the boundary line, and they have been produced at the principal office whenever any one entitled to do so desired to see them. Id.

Foreign.

16. Courts have no visitatorial power over foreign corporations doing business within the state, unless it is expressly conferred by statute. Republican Mountain Silver Mines v. Brown (C. C. App. 8th C.) 776

17. The invalidity of a resolution passed at its domicile by a foreign corporation to wind up its affairs will not entitle the courts of a foreign state in which it is doing business to decree its dissolution and appoint a receiver, if its directors have submitted to the jurisdiction so that relief may be afforded by simply enjoining the execution of the resolution. Id.

18. A corporation has, under the law of comity, the legal capacity to sue in states other than that from which its charter was obtained. Cone Export & C. Co. v. Poole (S. C.) 239

19. A foreign corporation can transact any lawful business in New York state which a nonresident natural person can do. Lancaster v. Amsterdam Improvement Co. (N. Y.) 323

20. A foreign corporation incorporated for the purpose of dealing in the purchase and sale of real property is not prevented by the statutes or public policy of the state of New York from transacting such business in that state. Id.

21. The power of a corporation created by another state to deal in the purchase and sale of real estate cannot be questioned by a party dealing with it, on the ground that such dealing is in excess of the powers granted to it by the laws under which it is incorporated. Id.

22. The right of a de facto corporation to transact business under a franchise which another state has attempted to confer cannot be questioned by individuals. Id.

23. A foreign corporation carrying on business in New York may there make an assignment for the benefit of its creditors without preferences, in the absence of any statute of the state of its creation prohibiting such assignment, although the laws of New York prohibit such an act on the part of domestic corporations. Vanderpool v. Gorman (N. Y.) 548

24. The prohibition of the New York statute against assignments by domestic corporations of property in contemplation of insolvency does not evince any public policy of the state forbidding the exercise by a foreign corporation having property in the state of its inherent common-law right to make such an assignment,—especially where the assignment is valid in the state of the creation of the corporation, and provides for an equal distribution of the property among all of the creditors, in conformity with the policy of New York regarding the distribution of the property of insolvent domestic corporations. Id.

25. A charge against a corporation of falsely and fraudulently posing as a domestic corporation, when it had in fact migrated to a foreign state, is not shown by the facts that the local office is not at all times open and the books are not always there, if the corporate property is within the state and the officers and books are frequently at the office, at least as often as the business requires. North & S. Rolling-Stock Co. v. People, Schaefer (Ill.) 463

A contract by brothers and sisters to whom land has descended in common, to hold the same as joint tenants, and that it shall pass to the survivor by descent or devise, and at the death of the last survivor shall pass to the child of one of such brothers by descent or devise, is not rendered unenforceable by such child by the fact that the last survivor has conveyed all the property, where the grantee had knowledge of the rights of such child,—especially where he obtained the property by fraud, without paying any consideration therefor. Murphy v. Whitney (N. Y.) 128

2. Words forbidding the removal of officers "for political reasons," in a charter authorizing the governor to make such removals "at any time for cause, to be stated in writing," cannot be given any practical effect except by operating on the conscience of the Executive, and do not permit the review of his action by the courts on the ground that a removal was in fact made by him for political reasons, contrary to his written statement of the case. Id.

3. The reasonableness of an ordinance is open to judicial inquiry, when it is passed in the exercise of a general authority to legislate on the subject without prescribing the mode of its exercise. Champer v. Greencastle (Ind.) 768

S. Rev. Stat. § 5844, it is made an offense against the United States. Id.

10. The provision as to crimes, in U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5328, that nothing in title 70 shall impair the jurisdiction of the states, exempts the cases specified in that title, which are also offenses under the laws of the several states, from the operation of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 711, which declares that jurisdiction by federal courts in respect to crimes and offenses shall be exclusive of the courts of the states. Id.

11. A state statute permitting a simple contract creditor to file a bill in equity without reducing his claim to judgment, for the purpose of reaching assets to pay the debts of an insolvent corporation, is not applicable to proceedings in the federal courts. *Morrow Shoes Mfg. 12. The rule of law in Tennessee, which prevents the defense of contributory negligence from being a complete bar to an action for injury to a person on a railroad track, under the statute, but makes it cause for reduction of damages, being one which grows out of the language of the statute itself, the construction thereof by the supreme court must be followed in federal courts, in an action arising in that state. Byrns v. Lake Roland Elev. R. Co. (Md.) 396

2. The building of a viaduct over railroad tracks in a public street, which practically closes abutting property to access by teams from the street, is such an extraordinary and unusual use of the street as could not have been reasonably anticipated at the time of its dedication, and therefore the abutting owner is entitled to consequential damages, under the Colorado constitutional requirement of compensation for property damaged, although it is limited by the courts of that state to unusual or extraordinary uses. *Pueblo v. 5. The simple fact that an abutting land owner did not, at the time a telegraph line was built in the highway, although aware of the purpose to build, object and prevent its construction by injunction proceedings, will not estop him, after the expiration of ten years from the date of such construction, from asserting his property interest in the highway and in the trees growing upon and in front of his premises. *Dailey v. 11. The burden of proof to establish the suicide of one whose life is insured is on the insurer, when suicide is set up as a defense. Leman v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co. (La.) 569

12. The death of a testatrix by suicide does not raise a presumption of insanity, —at least at the time of making a will six weeks before. Re Bey's Succession (La.) 577

18. The burden of proving insanity of a testator at the time of making a will properly executed and containing nothing to indicate unsoundness of mind is upon those who deny its validity, even if he was habitually insane. Id.

14. Fraud and illegality in contracts are not to be presumed. United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 73

15. A seller of goods procured from him by fraud has the burden of showing participation by a subsequent purchaser in the fraudulent acts by which the goods were procured. Morrow Shoe Mfg. Co. v. New England Shoe Co. (C. C. App. 7th C.) 417

Proof, that a pledgee of goods from a retail dealer knew that the latter was being pressed by his creditors, and was pledging goods not paid for; that the goods were in larger quantities than was called for by the business, were deposited in a warehouse away from such business, with all marks erased from the original packages; and that they were transferred on such terms as precluded redemption without any inquiry on the part of such pledgee; and that the latter made false statements as to previous loans to a receiver of the property of the pledgor, —is sufficient to throw upon such pledgee the burden of explaining the transaction and showing himself to be a bona fide holder. Id.

19. A rule of a railroad company printed on a timetable, warning employes against certain risks, with a notice that they will have no claim for injuries received in consequence of taking such risks, is admissible in evidence against an employe suing for injuries and charged with violating the rule. Ford v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (Iowa) 657

20. An ex parte map or diagram made by a witness and shown by him to be correct may be given in evidence, not as independent evidence, but to be considered by the jury in connection with other evidence, so as to enable them to understand and apply it. Poling v. Ohio River R. Co. (W. Va.) 215

21. A statute recognizing as evidence the proceedings of any legislative body "purporting on the face of the book to be printed by authority of the government" applies to a book compiled by an individual under statutes which are printed in full at the beginning of the book, and which recognize the compilation as authoritative and make it evidence. *Falls v. A schedule of rates cannot be excluded from evidence under the Illinois statutes, when accompanied by a regular certificate of the commissioners as to its publication, on the ground that it never took effect because never published as required by statute, since the statutes make the schedule and accompanying certificates prima facie evidence that the schedule offered is a schedule of the commissioners. *Chicago, B. & Q. 30. Expert testimony is not admissible on the question whether or not a glove contest is what is commonly known as a prize fight. State v. Olympic Club (La.) 452

Admissions.

31. No admission as to the ownership of chattels in possession of a carrier is shown by the fact that the one holding the bill of lading remains silent when an unsuccessful demand is made by a third person for them upon the carrier, in his presence, under alleged title papers, which will make the carrier's refusal to comply with the demand wrongful. Kohn v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (S. C.) 100

Declarations.

32. Evidence of declarations by deceased of intention to commit suicide is admissible in a murder case, if introduced solely to show the state of mind or intention of the one making them at the time they were made. Com. v. Trefethen (Mass.) 285

33. That deceased is a stranger to the proceeding will not exclude evidence of his declarations of intention to commit suicide, upon trial of an indictment charging one with murdering him. Id.

34. The trial judge cannot in his discretion exclude evidence of the alleged declaration of intention to commit suicide because of illegitimate pregnancy, made the day before the death of the one making them, whose condition continued until her death, because of lapse of time between the declaration and the death. Id.

35. Evidence locating the presence of deceased at another place at the time of an alleged interview at which she is alleged to have declared an intention to commit suicide is not of itself sufficient to exclude evidence of the alleged declarations from the jury, in a murder case. Id.

Relevancy.

36. Evidence that another employe had made complaint is inadmissible on the question of the employe's complaints of defects and promises to him to repair them. Ford v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (Iowa) 657

37. Evidence of an intention to commit suicide is not immaterial in a murder case, where deceased was found dead under circumstances not inconsistent with the theory of suicide. Com. v. Trefethen (Mass.) 285

38. Evidence of former burglaries upon the same premises, committed by one under indictment for burglary, is competent against him when he is shown to have declared that he did not intend to work, and that if he did not make his support out of the prosecuting witness he would make it out of some one else. State v. Weldon (S. C.) 126

39. Evidence of abuse by his master of one apprenticed by overseers of the poor, and of its results, is admissible against them, al-ment and should be known of its probable continuance and its effect. Com. v. Coyle (Pa.) 552

40. Ill treatment, and previous assaults by husband on wife, are admissible to prove motive in cases of marital homicide. State v. O'Neil (Kan.) 555

Sufficiency.

41. The fact that a child is of tender years will not prevent its testimony, if competent, from being sufficient to support a conviction of an indecent assault, when all the corroborative testimony has been given that is practically procurable. State v. Juneau (Wis.) 857

42. Proving blank indorsements after alleging indorsements to plaintiff will not constitute a failure of proof to sustain a finding in plaintiff's favor, where the execution of the indorsements was not denied so as to require them to be put in evidence. Horn v. Bennett (Ind.) 800

43. Proof of subsequent ratification will sustain an averment of agency. Bigler v. Baker (Neb.) 255

2. A claim against the United States under the Act of Congress of 1882 providing for the distribution of the award for the Alabama depredations is property in the jurisdiction of the courts of the District of Columbia, authorizing the appointment there of an administrator of the deceased claimant. Manning v. Leighton (Vt.) 684

3. An ancillary administrator is not liable to pay for services contracted for by the foreign administrators, since there is no privity between them. Id.

4. The settlement of an estate in a foreign jurisdiction will not be held to bar a claim against the administrator arising after the death of the deceased, upon a showing only that a claim against an estate must be filed within a certain time after the issue of letters, and that notice was given the claimant but no claim was filed, since ordinarily those referred to as creditors of an estate are persons holding claims against the deceased in his lifetime, and the requirements as to the presentation. 24 L. R. A.

5. An administrator of the beneficiary of a claim against the United States, appointed to meet a requirement of the court, and taking charge of the case with its approval, does not, by making use of proofs procured by a former attorney, accept the benefit of the latter's services so as to render himself liable to pay for them, where such proofs are in the files of the court and beyond the control of such attorney, and he has no knowledge that the attorney whom he employs has made an arrangement with the former attorney, who is relying on him to act in his interest. Id.

1. The grantees of lots under the town site Act of Congress have the right and privilege to have a street on which the lots abut forever kept open. Dooly Block v. Salt Lake Rapid Transit Co. (Utah) 610

2. The rights of abutting owners to use a street as a means of access to their lots and for light and air is the same where the fee of the street is held by a city in trust for the use of the public as where the fee is owned by the abutting owners. Id.

3. The legislature in delegating power over streets to municipal corporations cannot authorize any action which will materially injure the property of abutters in the right of access to their property and to light and air. Id.

4. The Missouri doctrine that a city may authorize a railroad track in a street does not extend to the allowance of a practical monopoly of the street by the railroad. Lockwood v. Wabash R. Co. (Mo.) 516

5. A city cannot authorize a steam railroad in a narrow highway devoted to wholesale business, when the operation of the railroad virtually destroys the use of the street for street purposes at least 8½ hours every day between 7 A. M. and 6 P. M., and the city charter declares that no railroad shall be so constructed as to prevent the public from using any street, while the general law prohibits railroads from impairing the usefulness of a street. Id.

6. If the construction of an additional track for a street-railway company would be an unnecessary obstruction to and interference with the ordinary use of the street, and the track privileges of an existing railroad company are sufficient for the business of two or more companies, they should all be obliged to use them in common. Dooly Block v. Salt Lake Rapid Transit Co. (Utah) 610

7. A telegraph company has no right to cut off branches from trees in a highway, which belong to an abutting owner, in order to clear a way for its line, merely because it has permission from the public authorities to construct its line along the highway. Dailey v. State (Ohio) 724

8. Authority to construct a telegraph line upon a highway does not empower the company to injure the property of an adjoining land owner, or to appropriate any of his property-rights in trees in the highway, except upon the condition that compensation be first made. Id.

9. An owner of land adjoining a public highway, whose title extends to the centre of the road, who has cultivated shade trees planted partly on his own land and partly in the line

10. 4. The prohibition of La. 5. The prohibition of the statute of New York to the effect that no second or other subsequent marriage shall be contracted by any person during the lifetime of any former husband or wife of such person, in case the former marriage be annulled or dissolved on the ground of adultery, has no extraterritorial effect, being a penal statute; and it cannot be given the effect of annulling a contract of marriage between persons at the time residing abroad, from one of whom a divorce had been obtained in another state for adultery, notwithstanding it was solemnized in the city and state of New York,—the contracting parties announcing their intention to be to thereafter reside in Louisiana, and afterwards actually residing there. Id.

INJUNCTION.

1. An injunction to prevent the laying of an additional track for a street railroad in a street may be granted to abutters, where the track would constitute an unnecessary interference to travel and an especial injury to the property-rights of the abutters. *Dooly Block v. An unincorporated guaranty and accident Lloyds association of another state, which issues policies in that name and has a board of managers with powers like those of corporate directors, to whom each member gives a power of attorney for management of the business, and the members of which contract for several liability to a limited amount, with the right to transfer their membership, must be held, when conducting business in Ohio without compliance with the conditions of the statutes, to be exercising a franchise and acting as a corporation so as to be subject to quo warranto proceedings. State, Richards, v. 3. An assessment fire association under Ohio Rev. Manufacturers' Mut. F. Asso. (Ohio) 252

4. The whole business of insurance being regulated by the Ohio statutes, which make it unlawful for any company, corporation, or association to do such business except on specified conditions, the carrying on of such business is the exercise of a franchise. *State, Richards, v. 6. The facts that the seal of a benefit society contains the words "$1,000 in seven years," and the by-laws are so worded as to lead persons to expect not to exceed two assessments per month, which return from such assessments is impossible of accomplishment, thereby furnishing designing men an easy means for entrapping the unwary, do not establish fraud as a matter of law, so as to give the association no right to assessments collected. Id.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS. See also COMMERCE, 3.

1. The purchaser of intoxicating liquor sold in violation of law is not a participant with the seller so as to be guilty of the offense. State v. Cullins (Kan.) 812

2. An ordinance prohibiting the use of screens, blinds, stained glass, or anything that will obstruct the view of the interior of saloons, is unreasonable and therefore invalid, under a mere general authority to license and regulate saloons. Champer v. Greencastle (Ind.) 768

3. Municipal authority "to license and regulate" the sale of intoxicating liquors does not include the authority to prohibit it absolutely. Ex parte Sikes (Ala.) 774

4. The only qualification of power contained in a grant to a municipality of the power "to fix the price of licenses" is that it shall not be prohibitory. Id.

5. A license fee of $2,000 is not invalid as prohibitory, or as a license for revenue as distinguished from a license tax for police purposes, where the agreed facts show that there is a population of 4,000 inhabitants, and the retail sales of the business for four years aggregate $851,000, while two thirds of the entire expense required to police the city are traceable solely to the sale of liquor within its corporate limits. Id.

6. Removing intoxicating liquor from the platform to the freight room of a depot is a transportation or conveyance thereof from "one place to another" within the state, within the meaning of the Iowa statute making transportation or conveyance an offense, in the absence of a certificate from the county auditor that the consignee is authorized to sell such liquors. *State v. 2. A judgment of the Court of Alabama Claims making an award to an ancillary administrator appointed in the District of Columbia cannot be collaterally attacked on the ground that foreign administrators were entitled to recognition. Manning v. Leighton (Vt.) 684

3. The appointment of an administrator cannot be collaterally attacked because the petition for administration fails to allege the death of the intestate, since the jurisdiction of the court did not depend upon the formality of the petition or adherence to any technical rule of procedure. Id.

4. The appointment of an administrator cannot be collaterally attacked on the ground that the petition falsely represented the petitioner to be a creditor of the intestate, where neither the residence of a creditor within the jurisdiction nor the application of one is essential to the jurisdiction. Id.

5. An objection to a judgment granting equitable relief in an action at law is not well founded under the Nebraska practice, which recognizes no forms of action, and allows either legal or equitable relief, according as the pleadings or proof warrant. Kirkwood v. Hastings First Nat. Bank (Neb.) 444

6. A meritorious defense must be shown in order to have relief against a judgment on the ground of fraud. Hollinger v. Reems (Ind.) 46

7. The right to relief against a fraudulent judgment rendered on unauthorized appearance by an attorney is not shown, where the debtor had left the case pending for four years with no one to look after it, and failed to discover it for six years afterwards, making no inquiry at any time, and delaying nearly a year after discovery. Id.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

The constitutional exemption of a certain amount of a debtor's personal property precludes a statutory lien for rent on personal property kept on the leased premises; and while the debtor can expressly waive such exemption, he does not waive it by the mere fact of entering into a lease while such statute is in force, as the legislature cannot thus indirectly destroy the constitutional right of exemption. *Hodges v. MANDAMUS.

1. Mandamus to compel the repair of a railroad track, a part of which is torn up, may be refused in the discretion of the court, where the road has been abandoned for months and cannot be operated except at great loss, not taking into account the repairs and taxes, and the proceeding not being commenced for the purpose of compelling the operation of the road. State, Little, v. Dodge City, M. & T. R. Co. (Kan.) 564

2. An eligible person lawfully appointed to a vacant office of town clerk, and duly notified thereof, may be compelled to accept, by mandamus. People, German Ins. Co. v. Williams (Ill.) 493

MARKETS.

1. An ordinance prohibiting the sale of vegetables in any other than a designated place between 7 A. M. and 2 P. M., which applies to all persons equally, is not unconstitutional or invalid, where the municipality has power to establish markets and provide for the cleanliness and salubrity of the city. State v. Sarra-dat (La.) 584

2. The fact that one raises his own produce gives him no right to sell it in violation of a city ordinance. Id.

3. Prohibiting the owners of wagons from selling their produce from wagons between the hours of 7 A. M. and 2 P. M., where no fees or dues are collected from the wagons, which may be backed up to the market banquettes for the delivery of goods previously sold to the owners of stalls, is not unconstitutional or oppressive, where the owners could rent stalls and dispose of their goods within the market during these hours. Id.

1. The right of an employé to recover for negligence of a corporation in hiring an incompetent servant over the protest of some of its officers is not affected by the failure of another employé to give notice of subsequent neglect and unfitness of such servant. Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Mussette (Tex.) 642

2. A railroad company, although required by law to erect and maintain a cattle guard at a certain point, must make it safe as a crossing for employés, if it so locates its switch yards that they are constantly required to cross it. Ford v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (Iowa) 657

3. A railway company is not responsible for the acts of an engineer and fireman in running an engine which it has rented to a bridge com- 94 L. R. A.

4. A baggageman on a train is not serving his master in delivering drills which are carried merely to accommodate persons who have no contract with the carrier, and for which the carrier receives no benefit; and therefore his negligence in throwing the drills from the car, by which a person to whom they are sent is injured, does not make the carrier liable. Walker v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (Mo.) 363

5. The fact that articles were sent by a ticket agent does not make a railroad company liable for negligence of a baggageman in throwing them from a train and injuring the person to whom they were sent, where they were sent by the ticket agent for his own benefit and carried by the baggageman merely as an accommodation, without the authority or knowledge of the carrier. Id.

6. The risk of injury from the caving in of the sides of a ditch 18 feet deep and 18 inches wide, while such ditches are not usually dug more than 6 or 8 feet deep, is not assumed by a laborer who does not know of the danger, but goes in under peremptory orders to dig it deeper. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Ward (Va.) 717

7. Obedience to orders will not be deemed contributory negligence, unless the danger was so glaring that no prudent man would enter into it even when, like the servant, he was not entirely free to choose. Id.

8. The proprietor of a theatre is liable for acts of a janitor and ticket taker, although he is also a special policeman, in wrongfully assaulting a person because he has engaged in a dispute as to his change with the ticket seller, who has attacked and beaten him,—especially when he has on his part committed no assault. Dickson v. Waldron (Ind.) 453

9. Arrests and detentions by agents or officers of a state agricultural society, which are not made for any of the causes for which power of arrest is given by statute to the society, are not within the scope of their powers so as to charge the society with liability. *A'Hern v. 1. The incorporation of a city so laid out as to include a dairy farm not laid out into lots or blocks, and occupied only by the owner and his family, does not violate a constitution authorizing the incorporation of cities and towns, on the ground that it can extend only to cities and towns existing, and cannot include any territory not actually covered by the city or town, but the boundaries of such corporations may include some territory for prospective expansion. Ferguson v. Snohomish (Wash.) 795

2. The taxation of a dairy farm included within city limits, for general municipal purposes, is not an unconstitutional taking of private property without just compensation,—at least where the constitution requires that taxes shall be uniform in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction of the body levying the same. Id.

3. A constitutional provision that "no indebtedness shall be incurred . . . except in pursuance of an appropriation" does not prevent the legislature from incurring, or immediately directing the incurring of, indebtedness for the usual and current administration of state affairs,—such as making a contract for public printing,—without first making an appropriation for the specific purpose. Carlier v. Thorson (S. D.) 784

4. Certificates of indebtedness of a city, purchased and placed uncanceled in a sinking fund of the city, even if the city continues to pay interest on them, do not constitute a part of the indebtedness of the city within the meaning of a constitutional restriction of the amount of its indebtedness. Brooks v. Philadelphia (Pa.) 781

5. A continuation of indebtedness not exceeding 7 per cent of the assessed valuation of a city, by creating new indebtedness as fast as the old debts are paid, is authorized by Pa. Const. art. 9, § 8, declaring that the debt of any city shall never exceed 7 per cent of the assessed value of the property therein. Id.

6. A loan of the city's credit to a corporation is not made by a contract between a city and a railroad company by which one half of the expense of abolishing grade crossings in the city is to be reimbursed to the city by the railroad company. Id.

7. The power of a city in respect to trees in streets can be delegated to a city committee composed of members of the board of aldermen. Tate v. Greensboro (N. C.) 671

2. The congregation of solicitors, hotel runners, and drivers of vehicles on the street in front of a railroad station, though constituting a nuisance to the public, if it does not interfere with the railroad company in the discharge of its duties is not a nuisance to the company for which it can obtain an injunction, although it may remotely affect the company's business by causing annoyance to its passengers. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & O. R. Co. v. Cheevers (Ill.) 156

3. The abutment and elevated structure of an elevated railroad built under legislative authority are not a nuisance, although they may create a liability for consequential damages. Garrett v. Lake Roland Elev. R. Co. (Md.) 396

1. The eligibility to office of every voter is not implied in a constitutional provision that no person excepting a voter shall be elected or appointed to any office. State, Thompson, v. McCallister (W. Va.) 848

2. Requiring an officer to be a freeholder does not violate a constitutional provision against any "oath, declaration, or test" as a qualification for office, as that refers merely to religious or political tests. Id.

3. Legislative power to add qualifications for office is not excluded by a constitutional provision giving the legislature power to prescribe "terms of office, powers, duties, and compensation" of officers, as well as the manner of their election, appointment, and removal. Id.

4. The power of the governor over the fire and police board of the city of Denver, Colorado, in respect to orders of appointment and removal, depends entirely upon the terms of the charter as amended by the legislature in 1898. People, Engley, v. Martin (Colo.) 201

5. An order by the governor for the removal of a member of the fire and police board, under a charter provision authorizing him to make the removal "for cause to be stated in writing, and not for political reasons," is exclusive and conclusive proof of the cause for making the order, and cannot be attacked by extrinsic proof. Id.

6. A de jure officer may at common law recover the fees or salary paid to a de facto officer; and this rule is in force in Illinois, although under the constitution the fees of the office belong to the county from which the salary is paid for the discharge of the duties of the office. Kraits v. Behrensmeyer (Ill.) 59

7. The fact that a commission has not been issued to a de jure officer will not defeat his right to recover from a de facto officer the fees or salary received by the latter, where the term of office has expired before the termination of the litigation as to the title to the office. Id.

upon the death of the last survivor the land shall by devise or descent pass to the child of the only married one of such brothers and sisters, who is then in being,—is not void as creating a perpetuity under 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 723, §§ 14, 15, declaring void every future estate which shall suspend the absolute power of alienation for a longer period than during the continuance of not more than two lives in being, and declaring that such power is suspended when there are no persons in being by whom an absolute fee in possession can be conveyed, since all the brothers and sisters uniting with such child can at any time convey a perfect, indefeasible title to the land. *Murphy v. 2. A declaration for negligence need not specify the acts or omissions which constitute the negligence, as these are matters of proof. Poling v. Ohio River R. Co. (W. Va.) 215

3. A declaration in an action for causing the death of a person by contact with a diseased animal fraudulently sold by the defendant should allege that the death was the natural and probable consequence of contact with the animal. State, Hartlove, v. Fox (Md.) 679

4. The nature of the aid furnished by the one for whose wrongful killing a recovery is sought, to the plaintiff in the action, need not be set out in the complaint. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Long (Tex.) 687

5. Failure to allege capacity to sue does not render a complaint demurrable as not stating a cause of action. Cone Export & C. Co. v. Pools (S. C.) 289

6. Failure of the complaint of a foreign corporation to show charter power to contract and sue is not ground for demurrer under a statute allowing a demurrer only when it appears from the face of the complaint that plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue. Id.

7. The existence of a corporation is admitted by filing an information against it by its corporate name to procure a forfeiture of its charter. North & S. Rolling-Stock Co. v. People, Schaefer (Ill.) 463

2. A power of attorney merely to sell land implies that the agent shall sell for cash; and he cannot sell on credit in the absence of authority contained in such power of attorney. Id.

3. The simple transfer to a third person of a writing by which one is empowered to sell land, implying a cash sale, without any payment of purchase money, is not a sale. Id.

1. It is not an unreasonable regulation for the legislature to require all regular passenger trains to stop at county-seats. State v. Gladson (Minn.) 502

2. The fact that a passenger train carries United States mail does not relieve it from the operation of a state statute requiring all passenger trains to stop at county-seats. Id.

3. A railroad company is liable for injury to a person lawfully near its track who is struck by some of the tools which are thrown from another person who is hit by a train, although he was negligent, if the railroad company was also negligent in failing to give signals and this negligence co-operated with that of the person struck by the train. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Hammill (N. J. Sup.) 581

4. A railroad company which has recognized the right of the public to use a footway alongside a railroad bridge, to and from a passenger station, and separated by a fence from the tracks, owes to a person who is using it the duty of ordinary care to protect him from danger. Id.

5. The requirement of a lookout on every locomotive, and the giving of an alarm and stopping of the train when any obstruction appears on the track, by Mill & V. (Tenn.) Code, § 1293, does not apply to a case where a person gets upon the railroad track so short a time before he is struck that it would be impossible to sound the alarm whistle and down brakes, or use any other means to stop the train. Byrne v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. (C. C. App. 6th C.) 693

6. A railroad company is not responsible for injury to a trespasser, if no duty is omitted after becoming aware of his danger. Raines v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (W. Va.) 236

7. If those running a railroad train discover a trespasser in imminent danger on the track, they must use all reasonable exertions to avoid inflicting injury; otherwise, the company will be responsible. Id.

8. If a person, apparently capable and in the possession of his faculties, is seen walking on a railroad track, the servants of the company running the train, having given such signals as are required, have a right to act on the presumption that such person will step aside in time to remove himself from danger. Id.

9. A railroad company is not responsible—at least to a mere bystander—for the negligent act of a postal clerk in a mail car in catching a mail pouch from a mail crane when the train is running at full speed. Poling v. Ohio River R. Co. (W. Va.) 215

10. A person standing on land of a railroad company, not in a highway, near a mail crane, for the purpose of witnessing the catch of a mail pouch, or some other like purpose, is a mere voluntary licensee, to whom the railroad company does not owe the duty of keeping the mail crane in suitable and safe condition. Id.

11. The defense of contributory negligence is not defeated, although the burden of proof is thrown on the defendant by Iowa Code, § 1288, providing that an injured party in order to recover damages from a railroad company for neglect or refusal to comply with the statute requiring safe crossings and cattle-guards need only prove such neglect and refusal. Ford v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (Iowa) 657

The word "issue" is a word of purchase, and not of limitation, in a deed creating a life estate, with remainder to the issue of the body of the life tenant. McIlhinny v. McIlhinny (Ind.) 489

RECEIVERS.

1. A receiver appointed in another state, of a railroad in that state, should be, not only on grounds of comity, but as a wise policy, appointed by a court to take charge of a small portion of the road which extends into its jurisdiction. Port Royal & A. R. Co. v. King (Ga.) 730

2. A court will not turn over to a receiver and assignee of a foreign corporation, who is appointed in another state, a fund which is in the hands of a local receiver, unless satisfied that no injustice will thus be done to citizens in that state. Fawcett v. Supreme Sitting of Order of I. H. (Conn.) 815

3. Funds in the hands of a Connecticut reof the Order of Iron Hall in that state, and made up of the reserved funds which were in the hands of the trustees of such local branches, which had been created by retaining, under the laws of the order, 20 per cent of assessments collected,—are subject to an equitable lien, on the insolvency of the corporation, for repayment of certificate-holders in that state, if they elect to treat the contract as rescinded, and will be retained for distribution among them, instead of paying them over to a receiver and assignee appointed in Indiana, where the corporation was created and is being wound up; especially where he claims the money for distribution among the creditors of the corporation generally, without any distinction in favor of certificate-holders. Fawcett v. Supreme Sitting of Order of I. H. (Conn.) 815

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

1. The constitution of a church, recognized and acquiesced in as the organic law of the church for more than fifty years, must be held to have been regularly adopted. Bear v. Heasley (Mich.) 615

2. A new constitution of a church, making some changes on the subject of infant baptism, the washing of feet, and secret societies, and adding a provision as to lay delegation and the declaration of a belief in "depravity," "justification," "regeneration," "adoption," "sanctification," and "endless punishment," made by the general conference of the church, which had no authority to change the constitution, is illegal, although these matters had been previously included in the discipline of the church, which the general conference had power to change, excepting where it would change the confession of faith. Id.

3. The decision of a general conference which is the highest tribunal of a church, that a new constitution and confession of faith have become the fundamental belief and constitution of the society, is not binding upon the courts where it is clearly shown that the fundamental law of the church, requiring a request by two thirds of the whole society before a change in the constitution can be made, has not been complied with, but that one general conference had appointed a commission to prepare a new constitution and submit it to a vote of the church, and a succeeding general conference declared the constitution adopted, although the affirmative vote of the church, while more than two thirds of the members voting, was much less than two thirds of the whole society. Id.

though constituting a small minority, are entitled to the church property, where the majority by revolutionary action have adopted a new constitution and refuse longer to submit to the organic law of the association. Id.

2. A purchaser of goods is affected by the fraudulent acts and intents of the seller in procuring them from a third person, if he has knowledge thereof, or of the existence of such facts and circumstances as are naturally and justly calculated to awaken suspicion in the mind of an honest man of ordinary care and prudence and lead him to inquiry. *Morrow Shoe Mfg. SHERIFF. See ACTION OR SUIT, 1.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE. See also CONTRACTS, 8.

1. Specific performance cannot be ordered of a contract for the sale of land, made by a man whose wife did not join in it and who refuses to execute the conveyance; nor can the husband alone be compelled to execute it, with a deduction from the purchase price of the value of her dower interest, as this changes the contract. Barbour v. Hickey (D. C.) 763

2. An unexplained delay of two years before filing a bill for specific performance of a contract to convey improved city property, upon which the price has not been paid, will defeat the relief sought. Id.

3. Specific performance being addressed to the sound discretion of the court, the party asking it must have been ready, willing, and prompt in the performance of those things incumbent on him; and where he has not been so, and it would impose hardship and be inequitable upon the other party, specific performance will be refused. Dyer v. Duffy (W. Va.) 339

4. A contract between abutters on a street about to be closed, that certain parts of the bed of the street shall be awarded to each, without specifying any instrument of title, and that then one shall sell and the other buy "at the market price" a strip fronting 7 feet on a designated street to a 10-foot alley not located, —is too indefinite to be specifically enforced. Schwanebeck v. Smith (Md.) 168

2. A provision requiring officers to tax and collect fees for the creation of a fund out of which their salaries shall be paid is within the scope of the title of an act entitled "An Act Fixing the Compensation and Prescribing the Duties of Officers." Henderson v. State, Stout (Ind.) 469

3. The compensation of officers, whether of state, county, or township, is a matter which may be embraced in a single statute. Id.

5. The invalidity of a statute as to fees of officers, on the ground that it is local and special as far as it applies to other officers, does not make it invalid as to sheriffs if the provisions as to the latter are complete within themselves and capable of being executed independently of provisions relating to other officers. Henderson v. State, Stout (Ind.) 469

6. A statute applying alike to all officers elected after it takes effect is not local or special because officers previously elected are exempt from its provisions. Id.

11. Words which have acquired a well-understood meaning by judicial interpretation must be presumed to be used in that sense in a subsequent statute, unless the contrary clearly appears. Id.

12. Re-enactment of a statute which has been construed by the courts must be presumed to be with the intent to adopt that construction. Cargill v. Kountze Bros. (Tex.) 188

13. No part of a statute can be sustained when it is apparent from inspection that unconstitutional sections of the statute formed an inducement to its passage. Low v. Res Printing Co. (Neb.) 702

14. A statute providing for condemnation of land is not entirely repealed, so as to be incapable of amendment, by a constitutional provision which renders inoperative the clauses of the statute relating to the jury. Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Adams (Fla.) 273

15. Provisions in a statute as to unlawful discrimination in rates will not, even if unconstitutional, make invalid other provisions as to reasonableness of rates. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Jones (Ill.) 141

TELEGRAPHS. See also EMINENT DOMAIN, 5; HIGHWAYS, 7, 8.

An ordinance imposing a tax of $2 on each telegraph, telephone, electric-light, or other pole except trolley poles used exclusively for wires of street railways, does not violate the right of a telegraph company which has accepted the provisions of the Act of Congress of July, 1866, giving it the privilege of operating a line over post roads. Postal Teleg. Newman (N. Y.) 102

TRIAL.

By jury, see EVIDENCE, 8.

See also EMINENT DOMAIN, 3, 4; QUO WARRANTO, 2.

1. A territorial statute providing for a verdict by three fourths of the jury in a civil case does not violate that clause of the Federal Constitution which provides for the right of trial by jury. Hess v. White (Utah) 277

2. In addressing the jury in a criminal cause, counsel may be allowed, in the discretion of the trial court, to read from standard works on matters of science and art, when pertinent, by way of argument or illustration; but it would be an abuse of this privilege to make it the pretense of getting improper matter before the jury as evidence, or to present matters of law conflicting with the instructions of the court. State v. O'Neil (Kan.) 553

3. When a given state of facts is such that reasonable men may differ upon the question whether there was negligence or not, the determination of the matter is for the jury. Raines v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (W. Va.) 226

4. But when the facts are such that all reasonable men must draw from them the same conclusion,—when there is no room for two reasonable opinions about it,—it becomes a question of law for the court. Id.

5. Whether an engineer leaving an engine standing under steam, holding a train on a steep grade, ought to have foreseen that an ignorant fireman left in charge might unintentionally or inadvertently put it in motion, is a question for the jury. Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Mussette (Tex.) 642

6. The character of the way used by the public, whether by dedication, prescription, or invitation, is a matter of law, when the facts are undisputed. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Ham mill (N. J. Sup.) 531

7. An instruction should be granted which asks that no inferences be allowed against a defendant for failure of plaintiff's wife to testify, where she cannot be called without plaintiff's consent. French v. Deans (Colo.) 887

8. An instruction that recovery can be had only for the loss of such pecuniary benefits as would have resulted "from the mental or bodily labor" of the deceased is wrong, where the prospective benefits were from the income of the property of the person killed. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Long (Tex.) 687

9. Averments that plaintiff had lost a certificate of deposit on which suit is brought, and that it was not indorsed, being put in issue, a finding merely that there is due to the plaintiff the amount of such certificate, without finding on either of the issues named, is insufficient. Kirkwood v. Hastings First Nat. Bank (Neb.) 444

TROVER.

1. A demand of goods in the hands of a carrier, by virtue of a chattel mortgage after condition broken, but without any legal process, made by a constable acting merely as agent of the mortgagees, will not make the carrier liable for conversion if it refuses to surrender them, where the goods were received from a third person who has a bill of lading therefor. Kohn v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (S. C.) 100

2. The refusal of a creditor of an insolvent estate to surrender to an administrator de bonis non certificates of stock standing in the name of a deceased administratrix is not a conversion where the creditor claims no interest in them except as creditor of the estate, and there is pending a claim of the administrator de bonis against commissioners of the estate for a conversion by the deceased administratrix. Mills v. Britton (Conn.) 586

8. Persons who deal in goods fraudulently obtained by a third person, recklessly and with knowledge of such facts and circumstances as would have put cautious and prudent men on inquiry, are chargeable with the value of the goods obtained by them from the fraudulent purchaser, which they convert to their own use, although they have paid the full value and the property has passed beyond the reach of the process of the court. *Morrow Shoe Mfg.
